Mr. INGALLS. It is not now an offense defined by the laws of the District, and this bill was forwarded to us from the law officer of the District for the purpose of covering the defect existing in the criminal code.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not an offense under the Maryland law to break into and enter a building?

Mr. INGALLS. Not under the peculiar circumstances defined in this bill. The necessity for it arose from the fact that the offense had been committed, and the offender being arrested it was found there was no statute under which he could be punished. The committee thought, on the recommendation of the law officer of the District, that it was advisable that the bill should be reported.

Mr. HOAR. I do not make clear the point of my question. If this be an offense now, if there is anything defined in this bill which is now an offense, and the bill creates either a new punishment or a new definition, it of course renders every person who has committed the offense already free from punishment.

Mr. INGALLS. In other words it cannot be executed retroactively.

Mr. HOAR. No; repealing the old law.

Mr. INGALLS. This does not repeal the old law, it is simply an addition to the crimes that are now defined.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator say that there is no law now existing in the District of Columbia, either inherited from Maryland or under any statute, which makes the breaking and entering of a bank with intent to commit larceny a punishable offense?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator evidently has not read the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I heard it read and listened carefully to it.

Mr. INGALLS. And I can state to him that upon information derived from the law officer of the District the particular offense that is described in this act is not now one that is punishable under the laws of the District.

That whoever in the District of Columbia, with intent to commit a larceny or any felony, breaks and enters in the day-time, or enters without breaking in the night-time, any dwelling-house, or breaks and enters any office, bank, shop, store, warehouse, vessel, or building in which valuable things are kept, any person being lawfully therein and put in fear, shall be punished by imprisonment not less than one nor more than ten years; but if no person was lawfully therein and put in fear, by imprisonment not more than five years, or by fine not exceeding $500.

The difference between the offense which the Senator from Massachusetts has in his mind and that contemplated in this bill is the fact of a "person being lawfully therein and put in fear." Of course it is an offense unquestionably to break into a store or dwelling-house or a bank, but the peculiar case that arose was in regard to the custodian, it appearing that under certain circumstances of occupancy or custody the offense was not one that was sufficiently described by existing statute to make it an offense that would be punishable under the statutes that now exist.

Mr. BECK. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. The bill provides for the punishment of persons entering shops, stores, &c., with intent to commit larceny. I have always believed it was better not to fix a minimum punishment in the law unless it was indispensable, but to leave it to the discretion of the court. For instance, some poor, ignorant person might break into a shop to steal a head of cabbage, and somebody might be alarmed, and might not the court punish sufficiently by imposing imprisonment for a year? I have always thought it better not to have a minimum if it can be avoided, but to trust to the discretion of the court as to the punishment.

Mr. INGALLS. Fixing a maximum merely.

Mr. BECK. In some cases a year's punishment might be enough. Here five years is the minimum.

Mr. INGALLS. I think there is force in what the Senator from Kentucky says.

Mr. BECK. I do not want a minimum. I want a maximum punishment to which the court can go, but let the minimum be in the discretion of the court. The minimum here is fixed at five years. It may be very severe in some cases which might come technically within the law.

Mr. HOAR. I want to come back for a moment to a point which I made before. This statute provides that all cases of breaking and entering a dwelling-house with intent to steal or commit any other felony——

Mr. INGALLS. That is not every element of the offense.

Mr. HOAR. Let me go on with my point.

Mr. INGALLS. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. HOAR. No; it provides for all cases of breaking and entering in the day-time, and for all cases of entering without breaking in the night-time a dwelling-house, bank, or other building. It provides if anybody be therein, and put in fear, one punishment; and then the alternative, if nobody is therein and put in fear, another punishment. So it provides for every possible case, only there is an alternative punishment, because there can be no case of a breaking and entering, with intent to steal or commit other felony, where there is not somebody there put in fear or somebody not there and not put in fear. It provides for every possible case.

Mr. INGALLS. It ought to.

Mr. HOAR. Then the Senator is mistaken in what he said just now. If it provides for every possible case, it repeals the existing law, and under the familiar principle of the common law that nobody can be indicted who has committed the offense before this time, it lets off scot-free every person who has committed this offense of breaking and entering any building with intent to steal or to commit any other felony, before the passage of the statute. It ought therefore to contain (and that was the point of my original suggestion) an enactment that it shall not affect any offense committed before the passage of the act.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Journal show that by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back the House bill on this subject as it was referred to that committee. I ask that a letter be read of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that is all I desire to say about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee reports without amendment from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (H. R. No. 6676) to more effectually punish house-breaking in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. The hour of two o'clock has arrived.

Mr. HARRIS. It will take but a moment to read the letter and to dispose of the bill, I am inclined to think.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 18, 1882.

SIR: The commissioners have the honor to transmit for the consideration of your committee the inclosed draft of a bill to punish breaking and entering banks, shops, stores, &c., in the District of Columbia, with intent to commit larceny or any felony therein, and copy of letter of Hon. W. B. Snell, judge of the police court of the District, inclosing the same to them.

The commissioners join in Judge Snell's recommendation that this or some more efficient measure looking to the same end be enacted as soon as practicable. There is no law in force in the District under which persons guilty of such trespass can be punished.

By order of the board.

Very respectfully,

THOS. P. MORGAN,
President pro tempore.

Hon. H. S. NEAL,
Chairman Committee for the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives, United States.

P. S.—A similar communication has been addressed to the chairman of the Senate Committee for the District of Columbia.

DEAR SIR: In the case of Flemming's carpenter shop, entered by thieves who blew open his safe and destroyed much property, the attorney finds no law to cover such offenses. I have copied the statute of Maine, and recommend that this or some more efficient substitute be immediately passed.

WM. B. SNELL.

Major T. P. MORGAN,
Commissioner District of Columbia.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6676) to more effectually punish house-breaking in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as I can judge from the reading of the bill, the objection which the Senator from Massachusetts raised to the other, that there is no saving there of the punishment of offenses already committed, applies. It seems to me it is very strange if there is no law in this District to punish burglary and house-breaking and offenses of that character. Notwithstanding the opinion of Judge Snell, I am inclined to believe that up to this time the District has not been left in that condition, with offenses of that kind not punishable somewhere. There is usually in all criminal codes a provision that offenses indictable at the common law are indictable under the State law. I presume there must be some such provision here. At any rate, I think that the saving clause suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts ought to be attached to the bill.

Mr. HOAR. It will do no harm certainly. If it be true that none of the offenses described in this bill are punishable now, the amendment can do no harm.

Mr. INGALLS. What amendment does the Senator suggest?

Mr. HOAR. If any of these acts are punishable it is necessary to have an amendment. I move to add:

This act shall not affect any offense committed or indictment found before its passage.

Mr. HARRIS. Would not any act of Congress intended to affect any such transaction be ex post facto?

Mr. INGALLS. Would not that be re-enacting the Constitution?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; it is very different from a re-enactment of the Constitution. You cannot make a punishment to which any person shall be liable for an offense committed before the act passed, but suppose the offense of house-breaking with intent to steal be punishable by imprisonment in the State prison or in the penitentiary a certain time. Now you pass a new law. The prisoner cannot be convicted under the old law because the new law repeals it, being a new provision on the same subject. He cannot be convicted under the new law, because that was not in force when he committed the offense In a great many States that blunder has been committed and new criminal laws have been passed which have had the effect of discharing every offender whose offense was committed before the passage of the law. The effect of my amendment is not to make anybody punishable who is not punishable now, or to say that he shall not be, but it is to save the right to indict and punish all persons who are punishable.

Mr. HARRIS. This bill was drafted by Judge Snell with a very accurate knowledge of the state of the law on the subject. I regret the necessity of any amendment, because it involves the necessity of the bill going back to the House.

Mr. HOAR. It is barely possible that there may be gentlemen in the Senate who know as much law as the police justice of the District of Columbia. It is not an absolute reason why he should legislate for it.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know whether any of us knows as much upon exactly that class of questions.

Mr. HOAR. I make no such claim for myself; but I understand it to be a perfectly well settled doctrine that if you pass a new penal law it repeals, unless prior offenses are expressly saved, the old law, and nobody can be convicted under the old law because that is repealed; nobody can be convicted under the new law because that was not in force when the offense was committed. It is necessary, therefore, to put in this saving clause. It will do no harm.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I now move, at the end of section 1, line 10, to strike out the words "less than one year nor;" so as to read:

Shall be imprisoned not more than ten years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. In section 2, line 13, I move to strike out the words "less than one year nor;" so as to read:

Shall be imprisoned not more than fifteen years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

IOWA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4166) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House, ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to object to the motion, but I should be glad if the Judiciary Committee would consent to recede from its amendments.

Mr. GARLAND. I did not hear the Senator from Iowa distinctly.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the condition of the bill. The differences, I understand, chiefly relate to the number of places of holding court. I should be glad if the Judiciary Committee could recede from its recommendation.

Mr. GARLAND. I will state in reply to the Senator from Iowa that this bill received a great deal of attention from the Judiciary Committee. The bill as it was reported back was a unanimous report, and instead of fixing eight places at which to hold the courts, as the bill provided as it came from the House, the bill as reported here provided that there should be only six. So far from the Judiciary Committee, as I am advised, acceding to the provision of the House, if they were compelled to do anything they would object to any bill at all and stand upon the present law, affording four places in the State of Iowa at which to hold the United States court.

For that reason I made the motion that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference, for I am satisfied that the Judiciary Committee would not go further than it has already gone in its recommendations upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas insisting upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House and asking for the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. HOAR were appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BANKRUPTCY SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1382) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. The pending question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert as a substitute what is known as the Lowell bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Considering the state of the public business and the period of the session, I am convinced that no action can be had by the Senate at this session upon this very important subject. Not desiring to fire in the air myself, but preferring that the discussion when commenced shall be continuous until the subject is concluded, I ask that the bill and amendments be made the special order for the first Wednesday in December next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. HOAR. That takes precedence of all other orders, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It takes precedence from that day forward of all other orders, unless there is unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. By making it a special order it takes precedence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read the rule. Rule 10 provides that—

Any subject or matter may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the hour fixed for the consideration of a special order shall arrive it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to lay such special order before the Senate, unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day, in which case the unfinished business shall have precedence.

The hour ought to be specified.

Mr. INGALLS. One o'clock.

Mr. HOAR. I am very sorry that the Senator from Kansas finds a condition of facts existing which makes it necessary or proper for him to make this motion. It is the desire of a very large number of persons all over the United States that the bankruptcy bill be considered at the present session; and it has been the hope that at last the Senate might send this measure to the House to be considered there and disposed of at the beginning of the next session. I had not anticipated such a request from the Senator from Kansas, and the order of my remarks might seem almost a discourtesy. If it had not been for his request I should not have submitted my remarks upon the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I really hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not put me under the necessity of stating what the facts are as I understand them as to that debate, because I cannot afford to be put in a false position.

Mr. HOAR. If there are any facts of misunderstanding the Senator will state certainly the facts as he understands them, and I will state the facts as I understand them.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator claims that the bill was called up when I made the motion to take it up for my own advantage, or in compliance with the dictates of my own judgment, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. HOAR. I do not claim that at all.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator stated to me that he desired specially, for reasons personal to himself, that I should call the bill up to enable him to present his amendment and to make a speech upon it.

Mr. HOAR. That is true.

Mr. INGALLS. Therefore when the Senator states that he regrets that I felt called upon to take the course I have taken he is slightly uncandid.

Mr. HOAR. No, I think the Senator misunderstands altogether my purpose in making any such suggestion. In making my remarks, before the Senator himself had explained the bill, and in advocating an amendment before the Senate, I was put in a position of seeming to be discourteous to him, and it was only his preference that I should go forward that made me make the speech at that time instead of waiting for the Senator. I did request the Senator, for very strong personal reasons which I stated to him, to bring up the bill at that time. I had a very strong desire that it should come up. I am speaking, not of bringing up the bill at that time, but of the order of the speeches.

Mr. INGALLS. The order of speeches was the Senator's own suggestion, and not mine. I said to him that it was not my purpose to call up the bill at this session, and he stated to me that it was his personal desire for reasons that were of great importance to him that I should call up the bill, not for the purpose of making my speech, but to enable him to make his. Therefore, when the Senator endeavors to cast the burden of this transaction upon me, he is slightly unjust to the courtesy that I extended to him in order to enable him to present the views that he desired upon the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misunderstood me then or misunderstands me now. I did not make any suggestion reflecting upon him, but I requested the Senator to bring up the bill at that time for the reason I stated.

Mr. INGALLS. And I did it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator very courteously to me consented to bring up the bill at that time, for which he has my acknowledgments, but I did not expect when it was brought up at that time to proceed with an attack on the bill before the Senator himself had made the argument. When it was called up the Senator came to me and asked me if I had any objection to going forward upon it. I said I had not. When I got through my argument the Senator stated to the Senate that he was ready to go on with the bill on that day; there was no difficulty, but he thought it would be better for the reason he stated to let it go to the following morning.

What I wish to call attention to is not the fact that the bill had been called up and put over by the Senator, but that the effect had been to make my argument. The Senator says he does not wish to fire in the air, because he does not wish to separate his argument from the vote. He leaves me in the position of having made my argument in the Senate, and then the matter going over until next December.

Mr. INGALLS. That is expressly what the Senator told me he desired to do. He said that in consequence of the importunities and representations of some of his constituents in the city of Boston, it was absolutely essential that he should make his speech. There was no intimation made on his part that he desired that his speech should be made contemporaneously with mine or coincident with action on the bill.

I regret that the Senator by placing me in such a position has called upon me to make this statement, but the bill was called up for his special advantage and at his instance to enable him, as I understood, to make the speech that he delivered on the Lowell amendment to the bill of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOAR. That is all true, but it is not the whole truth by any means. The Senator need not regret making any statement about it. There is nothing private to me which I am not willing to have public.

I hope that the measure will go forward and be disposed of at the present session.

Mr. GARLAND. I will simply say that I am in hopes the motion of the Senator from Kansas in regard to this bill will prevail. This is a very important subject, and there is very great pressure in the country for something to be done, but the views in reference to that something which should be done are very conflicting. The consideration of this measure will necessarily take up a great deal of time. The bill which the Judiciary Committee has reported to the Senate is certainly a very great innovation upon the question of bankruptcy proceedings, and it will challenge the closest attention of the Senate when it comes up. We could not hope to finish the bill under two weeks. When the bill was called up for the Senator from Massachusetts to make his remarks upon it, that was eight or ten, or probably eleven days ago, and if we had proceeded then continuously with the consideration of the bill we should have been nearly through with it now; but we have not been permitted on account of other business to do that; so that we are now so situated in reference to the measure that we cannot give it the necessary consideration at this session. We can proceed with it on the 6th of December, the day indicated by the Senator from Kansas, take it up then, and go through with it regularly and come to some conclusion in reference to it. As one of the committee with the Senator from Kansas, I second his suggestion in relation to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senate to proceed now——

Mr. INGALLS. Let us act on this motion first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. There is a motion pending which I suppose the Senator would have no objection to our disposing of.

Mr. BUTLER. No; I have no objection to a vote on the pending motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Kansas that the bankruptcy bill, which is now the unfinished business, be made the special order for the first Wednesday in December at one o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. I will say the first Wednesday after the first Monday, in order to make it sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask leave, from the Committee on Commerce, to make a report. I am instructed by that committee to report back the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, with amendments. I desire to give notice that I will ask the Senate to-morrow morning, after the close of the morning business, to take up the bill for disposition.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. GARLAND and Mr. VOORHEES submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BUTLER. I first addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska first addressed the Chair after the announcement of the vote just had.

Mr. BUTLER. I thought it was understood that I was recognized. I did not take my seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Senator from Nebraska rose and addressed the Chair first after the decision of the motion to postpone the bankruptcy bill. The Chair believes that it is very important the measure which the Senator from South Carolina has in charge should pass, that it is much more important than any other, but he must decide that the Senator who first addressed the Chair is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order under the Anthony rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the Calendar. The Senator from Nebraska rises for some purpose.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from South Carolina also rose for some purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the motion of the Senator from Nebraska takes precedence.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do hope we can have a consideration of the Calendar for the remainder of the day. We could dispose of a very large number of cases on the Calendar.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The regular order, the unfinished business, has been disposed of.

Mr. COCKRELL. The regular order is the Calendar, and it is so decided by the Chair. I call for that. The Senator from Nebraska wants to set it aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Nebraska is in order.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do insist that the Senator from South Carolina has the right of way on the organization of Territories. Alaska comes first. I think that is fair.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not inclined to antagonize the bill the Senator from Nebraska has in charge.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is a bill that I do not think will meet with any opposition on the final vote, at any rate. It may require some amending, but it is called for, I think, by all parties and all people connected with that part of Dakota.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply desire to say that I am quite willing to vote for the report of the committee upon that bill; but here is a large part of the domain of this country which has no government at all. I refer to the Territory of Alaska. The condition of the people in that country is really getting to be a scandal upon this Government. I therefore hope the Senate will not take up the bill proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, but will proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide a Territorial government for Alaska.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Nebraska is under the impression that his bill will go through without debate and opposition he is very much mistaken. As a member of the Committee on Territories I was not present at the meeting when it was decided to report the bill, and I shall certainly oppose it to the extent of my ability. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Nebraska on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to lay the motion of the Senator from Nebraska on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Chair that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska is not in order. Under Rule 13 the Calendar is the regular order of business, and his motion should be to set aside the regular order with a view to take up the bill he has indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is right. That is what the Senator from Nebraska intended to do evidently. He has moved to set aside the regular order with a view to take up the bill indicated by him. The Senator from Missouri moves to lay that motion on the table. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply desire to say before the vote is taken that I am not opposed to the bill urged by the Senator from Nebraska, but I think it is of much more consequence to take up the bill for the establishment of a territorial government in Alaska. I shall therefore vote to lay the motion of the Senator from Nebraska on the table, not that I am opposed to the bill at the proper time, for I am in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called on the motion to lay the motion of the Senator from Nebraska on the table.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.] Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALKER, (when Mr. GARLAND'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on this question.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

Mr. HOAR, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Beck,	Farley,	Pugh,	Walker,
Butler,	Grover,	Ransom,	Williams.
Call,	Harris,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Maxey,	Vance,
Coke,	Morgan,	Vest,

NAYS—22.

Aldrich,	Conger,	Hawley,	Rollins,
Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Lapham,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Ferry,	Miller of Cal.,	Windom.
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	Platt,
Chilcott,	Harrison,	Plumb,

ABSENT—33.

Brown,	Hale,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell,
Camden,	Hampton,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Logan,	Sherman,
Fair,	Hoar,	McDill,	Slater.
Garland,	Ingalls,	McMillan,	Van Wyck.
George,	Jackson,	McPherson,
Gorman,	Johnston,	Mahone,
Groome,	Jonas,	Miller of N. Y.,

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to dispense with proceedings under the Anthony rule, with a view to take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska now moves to take up the Pembina Territorial bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor.

Mr. SAUNDERS. At the end of section 18 I move to add:

And the governor, together with the superintendent of public instructions and treasurer of said Territory, when such officers shall be elected, shall have power to lease for the benefit of public schools any of the lands reserved in this section for a term not exceeding three years nor in any case beyond the time when the Territory may become a State, said leases to be in writing and in the name of the Territory, and in every instance to express that in no case shall the person occupying lands under said lease be considered to have acquired any legal or equitable interest in said land by reason of the improvements placed thereon by them, and any occupation of said land except under lease as hereinbefore provided shall be held to be trespass, and may be prosecuted in the name of the Territory before any court of competent jurisdiction.

That amendment is offered because heretofore in all Territories when they have been organized the school lands have remained in the hands of the Government until the Territory has become a State, and no action can be taken upon the matter either by sale or lease. It is proposed by this amendment not to interfere with the title in any way, but simply to allow the lands to be leased for a term of three years and not to extend beyond the time of admission of the State into the Union, and in no case to affect the title to the land. It is believed a considerable sum of money might be raised in this way. In fact, I have every reason to believe that such would be the case, and without any interference in any way with the right of the Government to the land or of the future State.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be again reported.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask that section 18 be first read, and then let the amendment be read.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Section 18 is as follows:

That when the land in said Territory shall be surveyed under the direction of the Government of the United States, sections numbered 16 and 36 of the public lands in each township of said Territory of Pembina shall be reserved for the purpose of being applied to schools in said Territory, and in the States and Territories hereafter to be erected out of the same.

It is proposed to add:

And the governor, together with the superintendent of public instruction and treasurer of said Territory, when such officers shall be elected, shall have power to lease for the benefit of public schools any of the lands reserved in this section, for a term not exceeding three years, nor in any case beyond the time when the Territory may become a State; said leases to be in writing and in the name of the Territory; and in every instance to express that in no case shall the person occupying lands under said lease be considered to have acquired any legal or equitable interest in said land by reason of the improvements placed thereon by them; and any occupation of said land except under lease as hereinbefore provided shall be held to be trespass and may be prosecuted in the name of the Territory before any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. INGALLS. I think that amendment is a very dangerous innovation. It is a departure from the policy heretofore pursued in regard to the land reserved in the Territories for the use of public schools in the States to be thereafter created, and it places a dangerous and questionable power in the hands of the board created by the amendment. It appears to me that serious complications might arise, and that it is very doubtful whether any advantage would inure to the Territory or the State thereafter to be created which might not be far outweighed by the difficulties that would attend the operation of the amendment.

Unless the Senator in charge of the bill has some more potential reasons to urge than those he has yet presented, my hope would be that the Senate would disagree to the amendment which is so wide a departure from the policy heretofore pursued in such cases.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The strongest argument that I could bring in favor of the amendment would be that it would enable money to be raised by the use of these lands for the purpose of educating the children. It is known, I suppose by every Senator here, that the people of a Territory have no right to use the school lands in any way, shape, or form for the benefit of their schools.

The amendment simply allows them, while Pembina remains a Territory, to lease these lands, not exceeding three years at a time, and not exceeding the time when it shall be admitted into the Union as a State, and that whatever they may raise in this way shall go to educate their children, which now has to be done out of the pockets of the patrons of the schools.

If the amendment needs anything more to restrict it and relieve it from any such dangerous position as the Senator from Kansas alludes to, let him offer an amendment to it. I think, however, the matter is worthy of consideration. I have of course no personal interest in it, but it has been urged upon me by parties, and it did not take much to urge it upon me, I can tell the Senate, to offer it, because I thought I saw in it some good to the people of that new Territory, who need the advantages of all the money they can raise, inasmuch as this proposition interferes in no way with the title to the land. I cannot see where there is any danger attending it.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment appears to me to be fatally defective in omitting to say what is to be done with the money that may be secured by any of the leases provided for therein. Nothing is said about where it is to be deposited, nor is there any bond to be executed or undertaking given for the faithful discharge of the trust, nor in case the land should happen to be timber land is there any provision against waste or destruction, so that obviously a great many difficulties would arise. The amendment is not sufficiently guarded. There is no limitation as to the power of these parties to lease, no limitation upon their liability, no provision made as to what is to be done with the money.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, yes; there is a limitation. The lease is not to extend beyond three years.

Mr. INGALLS. No provision is made as to where the money is to be deposited, what is to be done with it, how it is to be paid out.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is to be regulated by the Legislature, as everything else connected with the territorial matters. I do not see any harm in the provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PLATT in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. In section 20, line 5, after the word "act," I move to insert:

Except chapters 54 and 137 of the general laws passed by the Dakota Territorial Legislature at its last session.

So as to read:

That the inhabitants of said Territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Dakota, and to its inhabitants; and the laws in force in the said Territory of Dakota at the time of the passage of this act, except chapters 54 and 137 of the general laws passed by the Dakota Territorial Legislature at its last session, shall continue to be operative and valid in the said Territory of Pembina, so far as the same may not be incompatible with the provisions of this act, until the same shall be altered, modified, or repealed by the governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Pembina.

Mr. INGALLS. What are those chapters?

Mr. HALE. Those are chapters that the Dakota Territorial Legislature passed for the purpose of enabling certain counties to get rid of the process of courts that was out against the counties. They were made not applicable to special counties, but in general terms applying to all the Territory. One of them, for instance, was an act which provided that the resignations of county officers should take effect at once upon their filing without any notice being given.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the Senator the acts at hand, so that they may be read?

Mr. HALE. I have not them here. This matter has come up unexpectedly to me. I have got a reference to them. The operation of that was that where process of the courts, as executions, is out against municipalities and against counties the officers upon whom the process might be served, in order to attach the property of a county or to get at its funds, resign at once, and no process would lie.

Mr. INGALLS. Why were these laws passed?

Mr. HALE. They were passed for the purpose of avoiding judgments that were out against counties.

Mr. INGALLS. Are those judgments valid and binding?

Mr. HALE. Those judgments have passed through the tests of the territorial courts, have been appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and judgment has been rendered upon final appeal after full argument and hearing. I do not want in this new Territory any act of that kind to be allowed to remain in force.

Mr. INGALLS. What was the amount of the judgment?

Mr. HALE. There were several judgments.

Mr. INGALLS. What was the aggregate?

Mr. HALE. Amounting to some $30,000 or $40,000 in all, I think.

Mr. INGALLS. For what were the bonds issued?

Mr. HALE. The bonds were issued for a railroad.

Mr. INGALLS. Was the railroad built?

Mr. HALE. The railroad was built and is running. It is the medium through which the people of the territory do their business and transact their travel.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I would inquire if the judgments to which the Senator from Maine refers, or any of them, were recovered against counties which under this bill are included in the Territory of Pembina?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly not. If the acts had only applied to special counties I should not have asked for this amendment here; but they were made general and will apply hereafter if allowed to remain and encourage any other county in the same line of transaction. That is why I want this amendment made.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think it would be well for the Senator to send for the general laws of Dakota; they can be found in the Library.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. The very thing has occurred which I endeavored to anticipate and avoid this morning. I had not the most remote idea that this bill would be called up out of order. It was reported on the 1st of July. I was not at the committee meeting when the bill was considered. It is a part and parcel of the Dakota bill. I have all the authorities in my room, and can produce them here if a little time is given. As to the acts of the Territorial Legislature of Dakota, I would say to the Senator from Kansas if he will look at this pamphlet he will see references to the acts referred to by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I have them all at home, as the Senator has.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask him a single question here?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that in response to the Senator from Wisconsin the Senator from Maine stated that the counties affected by these territorial acts are not included in the area of the proposed Territory of Pembina.

Mr. VEST. That is true.

Mr. INGALLS. And therefore that his amendment must necessarily be intended merely as a menace or admonition to the counties which are so included that it would not be wholesome or salutary to them to enact such statutes hereafter. I would be as far as any person from encouraging repudiation, but it appears to me that if the counties affected by this legislation are not in this proposed Territory the amendment is not germane to the matter of the bill.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is mistaken. These counties are included in the operation of the territorial acts referred to.

Mr. INGALLS. Then what was the statement of the Senator upon the interrogation of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Wisconsin asked whether the counties in the proposed territory are the counties the acts of which caused those laws to be passed. The laws are general, but the counties whose conduct gave rise to this transaction are not in this territory, which is what the Senator from Wisconsin referred to. The acts are general.

Mr. VEST. I am very well satisfied that this bill cannot be finished to-night. I am anxious myself to make some remarks upon it. The authorities are not here; the bill was taken up suddenly. I was not at the committee meeting, as I stated, when the bill was agreed to be reported, and I understand from my colleagues on the committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] and the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] with whom I have conferred upon it, that they did not agree to report the bill favorably, but only that it should come before the Senate for consideration. I move that the consideration of the bill be postponed until a week from Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to make a statement in reference to the bill. The Senate will bear in mind that during this session of Congress there were several propositions sent to the Committee on Territories for the admission of a State in Southern Dakota, and also a proposition at the same time to take the northern part of Dakota and convert that into a territorial government of itself. The question was before the committee a good many different times, and finally it was suggested to the committee to report this bill, or a bill similar to it, providing for the organization of the Territory of Pembina from the northern part of Dakota Territory. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and myself upon that committee, reserving all questions of objection to the bill, agreed, as there was a majority of the committee favoring it, that it might be reported, but not that we should agree to take it up or should favor the bill, because the question suggested now by the Senator from Maine was a stumbling-block in the way, which he presented some months since in reference to the making of a State out of the southern part of Dakota.

In regard to the motion made by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] I hope it will prevail, because the bill in its present condition is very crude in reference to what has transpired already in the Senate with regard to the indebtedness, or at least the alleged indebtedness, of certain counties; but we can take it now that it is an absolute indebtedness, because the highest court in the country has so decided. In that respect I say the bill is crude and needs considerable reformation. Whether these counties are in the proposed Territory of Pembina or in the other portion of the Territory of Dakota, it would make no difference as to the legal liability of this new territory, if the old territory was liable for those debts or for any portion of them.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? This was not a territorial debt at all, but a county debt, and there could be no question, I think, that no county in this new territory would be held answerable for the debts that are in controversy. They were municipal debts of particular counties, which are in the southern part of Dakota Territory.

Mr. GARLAND. The interruption of the Senator from Indiana is of course permissible, but it does not meet what I was stating. I remarked that if the present Territory of Dakota was in any way liable for these debts, or any of them, the liability would attach to the new territory pro rata.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator why not insert a clause in the bill to that effect?

Mr. GARLAND. That may be done. Admitting that the Senator from Indiana is entirely correct about this matter, that it is simply a municipal debt with which the territory, whether southern, northern, or what not, has nothing to do, yet there are obligations of Dakota Territory that necessarily follow all of this territory, however it may be dismembered, however it may be separated, however it may be divided. We had this question arising in reference to the debt of West Virginia and old Virginia, in which, in 11 Wallace's Reports, the Supreme Court held, as was the law recognized in this country and in England, that in the dismemberment of a territory the debt of the old territory followed that territory wherever it went.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again? Is he able to state to-day that the Territory of Dakota as now organized has any territorial debt.

Mr. GARLAND. As I stated just now, I think she has, but whether she has or not I want to put it in this bill so that there can be no litigation, so that there may be no controversy about it; that if she has liabilities this new territory shall bear the burden of those liabilities pro rata. In view of that I wish time to look into the bill and prepare an amendment to it, and also that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine may be prepared according to the real facts of the case and the authorities as he has them.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator mean by pro rata? In what proportion? Population, or wealth, or size?

Mr. GARLAND. I mean in proportion to territory, to wealth, and to population. Some authorities go so far as to hold (and I think this is correct) that the new territory is liable for all the debts of the old or original territory.

While I do not wish to throw any obstruction in the way of the consideration of this bill, I hope the motion of the Senator from Missouri will prevail.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to make a statement for a moment? When this question was considered by the Committee on Territories I was one of the members of that committee present and consenting to the bill being reported to the Senate. The Senator from Nebraska, the chairman of the committee, came to me afterward on the floor of the Senate and submitted an amendment which he has offered this morning, and to which I urged no objection. At the same time, I said to him that of course I should reserve the right to submit any amendment I chose on the floor of the Senate, although I had consented to report the bill. I state now that I did favor the reporting of the bill and have no objection to it.

I think there is great force in what the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Missouri have said. There are some very complicated and difficult questions that might come up in the consideration of this bill. As to how far this new territory may be liable for these debts, whether it is liable or may be liable at all, is a legal question. How far the territory of Southern Dakota may be liable, if liable at all, is also a legal question.

I therefore submit to the Senator from Nebraska that while I consented to a favorable report upon this bill, I think he would perhaps expedite its passage by consenting to the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I thank the Senator for his candid and fair statement of the action of the committee. The Senator from Missouri was not present at the time the bill was reported. All the rest of the committee were in favor of reporting the bill or gave their consent to it. The Senator from Missouri was, I believe, in New York at the time and was not consulted, as he would have been if he had been here.

The objections raised by the Senator from Arkansas do not amount to anything, I think, when we come to inquire into the facts of the case, which are that there is, as we have been informed by the territorial officers of the Territory of Dakota, no debt against the Territory that is not provided for. The debt that is alluded to by the Senator from Arkansas and by the Senator from Maine is a county debt. The county in which Yankton is located voted certain bonds to a railroad, conditioned that the railroad company should build its road and its depots, &c., in accordance with the compact. That question is in suit; it is in court; it is now a matter to be settled by the court; but there is nothing, as I understand, that is not provided for in some other way; that is, by assessment against the property to pay all the debts of the Territory, as I have been told.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator, does he mean to say that the controversy between the bondholders and the county of Yankton is now in court?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand that it has been in court, at any rate.

Mr. HALE. It has passed entirely through; the courts have exhausted their process, and it is only the legislation that took place at the hands of the Territorial Legislature which prevented the mandate and process of the court from being executed. There is nothing further that the bondholders can do in court.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand the Senator from Nebraska, he is practically right. It may be that this claim has gone to final judgment, and in the highest court; I think that is true; but still it stands as a judgment upon the dockets of the United States court in Dakota, and the process of that court is out for its collection, so that it is practically in court still.

Mr. HALE. By no means. That is precisely where the arresting hand of the Legislature of Dakota came in, in its rude and lawless fashion, to prevent what was the final judgment of the court from being executed—a most glaring and atrocious piece of repudiation, I tell the Senator from Indiana; one that neither he nor I can stand upon for a moment. If he investigates it he will not vote for it; he will not sustain it for a minute, nor will the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HARRISON. I have never believed that that question was involved here. I had supposed that if the creditors had an honest debt, as I believe they have, they will reach ultimately the collection of their debt, but I have not believed that the Senate of the United States should make itself a bailiff's officer to collect anybody's debts.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator believe that when a Territory knocks at the doors for admission, with its hands fouled with the worst piece of repudiation, which it persists in carrying out, we have not a right to ask any questions about it?

Mr. HARRISON. So far as the amendment of the Senator from Maine is concerned, I have no objection to it as a member of the Committee on Territories. This discussion as to the relation of Southern Dakota, or those counties there, to that debt which is due to some of the Senator's constituents has no place here at all. I am entirely agreed to putting on the amendment he suggests, and that these laws which he regards as so obnoxious shall not by this bill we are now about to pass be made applicable to the Territory of Pembina.

Mr. HALE. That is my amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I am entirely agreed to that, and I do not think there will be any serious controversy over it. We shall come to the other question when the debate is on upon the admission of Southern Dakota as a State. The question now is whether we shall organize the northern part of the present Territory of Dakota as a new Territory. I think there was not a member of the Committee on Territories, certainly not more than one, who, upon the statements made to us by the Delegate from that Territory of the geographical relations of the northern part of the Territory to the southern, did not agree that it was due to the people of the northern part of that Territory that they should have an independent government. I am told that access from the northern part of that Territory to the southern is by way of Saint Paul; that the people in the northern part of the Territory in order to reach the capital of their Territory must come entirely out of the Territory to Saint Paul and then go to Yankton, and that it is a distance of seven or eight hundred miles from parts of that Territory that they have now to travel to the seat of government. The two parts of the Territory are practically isolated, more so than many States in the Union which are five hundred miles apart.

I think it will be made clear when the discussion is on upon the merits of this bill that it is a simple act of justice to those people to give them an independent Territorial organization.

So far as the matter of the debt is concerned, as I have already said, I take it there will be no objection on the part of the Senator who is in charge of the bill to the amendment of the Senator from Maine. I do not know whether the legislation to which he refers changed the law at all. If I were to speak off-hand on this subject, I should say the resignation of those officers would take effect without reference to the law, from the time the resignations were filed with the proper person to receive them.

However that may be, I do not desire that that shall be drawn into this controversy. I am entirely willing that the amendment of the Senator from Maine shall be adopted and those particular laws which he regards as obnoxious shall not be by this enabling act made a part of the law of the Territory of Pembina.

The suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas is simply seeking in the clouds for objections. No one has affirmed upon the floor of the Senate that there is a debt to be divided. My impression is that there is none; that there is no debt now of the Territory of Dakota which we need by legislation to provide for apportioning between these two parts when they are severed by this enabling act; but if there is any debt at all, it is one that grows out of the construction of a public building in Southern Dakota, and the building will remain, and the debt to pay for it ought to remain on the southern part of the Territory.

We have a bill here that was introduced many months ago and that the entire body of the Committee on Territories present agreed should be reported. The Senate has by vote to-day determined to take it up, and we have already consumed some little time in a scattering discussion of some of its provisions. I hope we may go on to consummate it. There is abundant time (we shall hardly finish the discussion of it to-day) for any Senator to examine the bill and prepare any amendments that he thinks ought be incorporated in it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska obtained the floor and yielded. Does he desire to go on?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I only wished to say when I rose and the Senator from Maine intervened that I do not know whether I shall object to his amendment when I hear the acts referred to read. My own opinion is, however, that we do not want to trammel the bill with anything connected with the difficulties of other Territories, and I hope no obstacle will be thrown in the way unless there shall be something that is really deserving proposed. I hope the amendments will be voted down and that the bill may be passed. Here is a country extending all the way from the northern boundary of Nebraska to the British possessions and from the western boundary of the State of Minnesota to the Territories of Wyoming and Montana which is all included in one Territory.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, for information, whether there is any mountain barrier or any desert country toward the center of Dakota which would prevent the people of the northern part of the Territory from coming down to the south by an overland route?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not think the country would prevent it; but there is no good road, as I have been told.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will permit me I will make a statement.

Mr. SAUNDERS. One word more while I am on this point. There are no railroads running north and south through that Territory; the roads are all running from the east to the west and making their way to the mountains. In consequence of that to go by rail you would have to go, as was stated, by way of Saint Paul in order to reach the capital of the Territory.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me just there. What I wish to ask is, suppose the capital of the Territory of Dakota were removed to some point toward the center of the Territory, would not that entirely obviate the necessity of going around the elbow to get to the nose?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly not; because it would only be removing it up in the level lands. The difficult lands to pass through would be still all north of that, because if the territorial capital were removed it certainly could not go beyond about half way where they propose now to make the southern line of the new territory. There is not a member of the Senate here, I presume, who does not think that the present Territory of Dakota will be made two different States in coming time.

Mr. MORGAN. The country is entirely practicable for railroads, I understand, from its northern to southern boundary through the center.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Senator is probably aware that railroads from the north to the south have not been built extensively, mainly because they do not pay, while they have from east to west; and in new countries we are glad to get roads built from the east to the west. By and by roads in that country will be built on north and south lines, but not at the present.

Mr. MORGAN. My question had no reference to the condition of the railways, but the practicability of building them from the northern boundary of Dakota to the southern boundary through the center of the Territory. I believe there is no dispute about that. It is an entirely practicable country for railways.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There are six degrees of latitude lying between the northern boundary of Nebraska and the British possessions, and that is all covered now by one Territory. There will be railroads in both these territories running from the east to the west at an early day; and I am told by parties who live in the northwest part of that Territory that it takes them more than a thousand miles' travel to get to their capital—more than a thousand miles of travel on any regularly traveled routes or in any way without crossing the wild lands, as we term them; I mean unsettled lands, or through the Indian reservations. It seems to me that as an act of justice we ought not to fail to pass a bill of some kind which will organize a separate territory for these people.

Now, Mr. President, in the other House—I know it is not proper to speak of what they are doing—but I will say that already a bill is pending there to add a fifth member to the judiciary, so as to accommodate this part of the country with a court. In the event that this bill should become a law, we should only have six judges in the whole Territory—I mean in both territories—and they will ask for five in case this thing is not done, for the one territory.

So far as these people are concerned, there is no kind of doubt of their having the necessary numbers. They had about thirty-five thousand in 1880, and they say themselves on an estimate they have made from the lands that have been entered, and from other data, that last January they had at least 60,000 people in the Territory that will be included within these boundaries. Surely, then, in any sense, these people are entitled to our consideration and to favorable consideration at this session.

We have put this matter off on account of the proposition that was made to make a State of Dakota. I believe that it should have been done; I believe it ought to be done yet. There are 150,000 people at least in that Territory, possessed with all the advantages of towns and of railroads to such a degree as no other Territory ever had, and with a wealth that no other Territory ever had when it was admitted into the Union; and we are about to close this session without passing any bill for their relief. I saw plainly that that bill would fail to become a law at this session, and therefore I urged on the committee the consideration of this bill at this time; and I must say that I had hoped that this bill would not meet with any opposition from either party or from the Representatives of any portion of our country.

It seems to me it is one of those things that appeal not only to the people of the Northwest, who are sympathizing with them greatly, because they know the wants of their neighbors, but the South, the East, and all other quarters ought to come up to consider the rights of these people, and consider not only what their rights are, but what our duty is to them, because they cannot do it for themselves. They cannot erect themselves into a territory; it requires Congressional action; and I think, now that we have got this bill before us, we should not delay taking action longer. It can be passed through, in my opinion, to-day, or within an hour as well as it can be within a week's time. Everybody knows something of what is required to be put in an act organizing a territory; we are all more or less acquainted with it; and many Senators here have helped to make numbers of such acts. If there is any amendment needed, let it be proposed. If amendments are proper admit them; if they are not, vote them down; but let us go on with this bill and not postpone it a day longer, but pass it now while we have it before us.

Mr. BUTLER. As I stated a while ago, I gave my consent to this bill in committee for the reasons that have been stated by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS,] the chairman of the committee, and the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON.] It appeared to me from the showing made by the Delegate of that Territory and by a large delegation of very respectable and reputable gentlemen of intelligence, character, and property in that Territory, that there was very great reason why the Territory should be divided as is proposed by this bill.

As the Senator from Nebraska has stated, it was represented to us that the railroads all ran east and west, none running north and south, and the consequence was that the people living in the northern part of Dakota were subjected to very great inconvenience in getting to their capital. It is true that might be obviated to a very large extent by moving the capital to the central part of the Territory; but it was also demonstrated that railroads, for some cause which it is not necessary now to inquire into, did not run north and south, and it appeared to me that there was great reason in their request.

There is another matter which has not been stated. This Territory has, as I understand, geographically an area of about 150,000 square miles, an enormously large area, furnishing ample territory for two large States, and for one I shall have no objection at the proper time to their being admitted. I did oppose the admission of Southern Dakota as a State, and I shall continue to do it until I become satisfied that they have a population which will entitle them at least to one Representative in the lower House of Congress, but beyond that I do not propose to go.

I see no earthly objection to the people in the northern part of the Territory, thirty-five or forty, or perhaps fifty thousand inhabitants, having the benefits, if there are benefits, of a territorial organization, and hence I consented to the bill being reported.

As to the question of the debt of Yankton County, as I stated a while ago, it is very questionable how far the legislative department of the Government can or may properly go in the enforcement of an execution. Those are questions, however, which ought to be considered, and considered deliberately. I am perfectly frank to say that the conduct of the people of Yankton County in refusing to pay this debt is wholly indefensible, and I agree with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it is thoroughly unjustifiable. If there ever was a case of justifiable repudiation, this is certainly a case that has no justification whatever.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question. I ask him if the people that want this territorial government now were not parties to that repudiation, and did not vote for it? Here is the law that they passed in which they nullified the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and made themselves parties to it, and if the people of Yankton were guilty the people who now apply for this territorial government are equally guilty, and here is the act that proves it.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a question which I do not undertake to enter into. I do not intend to endeavor to settle such questions. Whether or not the people of Northern Dakota were parties to this repudiation is a question which I think does not enter into this issue at all. As I said a while ago, I think it is entirely indefensible upon any possible principle, and I do not intend to justify it; but how far the Senate of the United States can correct the conduct of people in refusing to pay a judgment of a court is a question I shall not attempt to decide. I think it very likely, as the Senator from Missouri has said, that the very people who are now applying for the organization of a separate territorial government were as reprehensible as those who live in Southern Dakota; but whether that is to deprive them of a separate territorial organization is extremely doubtful. If the Senator from Maine, or any other Senator, proposes an amendment to this bill which will make them liable, if they are liable, I shall vote for it.

Mr. HARRISON. In response to the Senator from Missouri, I would say simply that it seems to me this is carrying this business very far, especially when we have so many States in the Union that have not a few municipalities that are in default upon their debts and have resorted to measures more extreme and indefensible than is represented to have been the case with Yankton County in Southern Dakota. I say that we are going a great way when we say to the people of the northern part of this Territory, "We will not admit you at all into territorial relations to the United States because the members of the Legislature from that part of the Territory in the Territorial Assembly voted for an obnoxious law." The Senator from Missouri says that the people of the northern part of Dakota, that portion of the people now proposed to be organized into a separate territory, are responsible for this repudiation or for this debt. I repeat again, that as to the debt they are no more responsible than his State or mine. It is a municipal debt, and the people of the northern part of this Territory are no more responsible for the debt of Yankton County than the people of Missouri are for the debt of any county in Missouri that may have defaulted on its obligations. It was upon the strength of the county, upon its tax duplicate, upon its assessable property, whatever it was, that this credit was given and these bonds issued. They are not territorial bonds. So that it is perfectly clear that they are not responsible for the debt, that if they were to remain forever a part of the Territory of Dakota not one dollar of the debt could ever be levied or assessed upon the property of a single inhabitant of Northern Dakota.

Mr. VEST. Nobody has ever stated that.

Mr. HARRISON. If nobody has stated that, I pass to the other proposition, which is that they are in some sense morally unfit to be organized as a territory because their delegates in the Legislative Assembly voted for this obnoxious law. Now I submit, Mr. President, that we have no information on that subject. I do not know whether the Senator from Missouri has gone through the vote on that bill, and is able to state here to-day that the representatives from the northern part of the Territory of Dakota voted for it.

Mr. VEST. There was no opposition.

Mr. HARRISON. There may have been no opposition to it; and where do we come now? The Senator from Missouri says that a brave people like those who occupy Northern Dakota, a people made up of immigrants from all our States, a people as intelligent, a people as well grounded in public and private morals as any in our States, are to be cut off from these relations and denied a territorial government because some members of the Legislature from Northern Dakota did not enter their protest against the passage of this law. I think the Senate is hardly ready to come up to that. I grant there is no information that they did it, but it is simply said there was no opposition to it. I submit, Mr. President, that this is a very slender ground for opposing the organization of this territory, that we must find something more substantial to resist what the Senator from South Carolina has conceded to be and what I think all the members of the Committee on Territories, except perhaps the Senator from Missouri, conceded to be a most reasonable request under the circumstances.

If the amendment of the Senator from Maine is adopted, then this obnoxious law is not in force in the northern part of this Territory, and I do not believe the Senators on either side of this Chamber are prepared to support the position of the Senator from Missouri, that because the delegates from the northern part of this Territory did not set themselves in opposition to these laws, therefore the people that they represented, or misrepresented if you choose, those who were there then and elected them and those who voted against them and the great population that has poured in there since are to be denied what would otherwise be their due because of the default or misfeasance of these members of the Legislature.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, as the Senator from Nebraska stated, I was not present at the meeting of the committee when this bill was in a quasi sort of fashion agreed to be reported to the Senate. I was not in the city of New York, I would inform the Senator, though it is not at all disreputable to be there, but I was attending the Committee on Commerce, working upon the river and harbor bill, which has been reported to-day. I would much rather have been in New York if I had consulted my own convenience.

But, Mr. President, I put myself upon no new ground in regard to repudiation. I have fought it wherever it has lifted its head, in State, national, or municipal matters. The Senator from Indiana says that muncipalities in the various States have repudiated their obligations. Yes, sir; I do not know a State, the Senator's State, my own State, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator particularize as to Indiana?

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator say that no municipality there has ever had any question about its indebtedness?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not say that. There are many that have, but I think he will find difficulty in designating one that ever repudiated its debt.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator will state that there has been no municipality in his State that has ever questioned its indebtedness and litigated its indebtedness——

Mr. HARRISON. I cannot say that, because there are many municipalities that very justly and honestly contest debts that are presented against them, and some have in Indiana; but I do not recall, and I do not think the Senator can recall, any municipality in Indiana that has repudiated its debt. It may have litigated its debt to a judgment, but I do not know of any now that has not paid its debt.

Mr. VEST. I use the word "repudiation" because it has been used in this debate and generally in the debates of the Senate as applying to all those cases where municipalities have contested their indebtedness until the courts have decided against them. I know no case in the Northwestern States, in my own State particularly, where a municipality has refused to pay an honest and a legitimate indebtedness. The courts have decided against those counties upon technicalities and upon great principles of commercial law.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I asked the gentleman whether there have not been counties where the same thing has been done in Missouri that is charged here, where officers have resigned with a view of evading the process of the courts telling them to levy assessments to pay municipal debts.

Mr. VEST. I recall now one or two cases where county officers have resigned, but I recall no case—and that is the point to which I am coming to wipe away with one single sentence all the imputations made by the Senator from Indiana, or by those who agree with him in regard to this bill—there is no case in which the State of Missouri directly or indirectly through its Legislature ever indorsed any evasion of municipial indebtedness.

Mr. HARRISON. I made no such suggestion as that.

Mr. VEST. That is the point in the case. I know it has been published here in the public papers, by the Delegate from this Territory in the Republican of this city, that it came with poor grace from me to say anything about repudiation in Dakota when I came from a State that was honeycombed with repudiation.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope that reflection of the Delegate has not been attributed by the Senator from Missouri to the committee. I hope he will not allow that imputation to lead him into opposition to this bill.

Mr. VEST. I will undertake to defend my own convictions on this subject in my own fashion and not be influenced by anything of that sort. I allude to it simply to show the line of argument, or rather the unfair and false pretense to an argument which has been used to influence the public mind upon this question. The State of Missouri, let me say now once and for all time, indorses no such conduct as the people of Dakota were guilty of, or the people of Yankton and another county in that Territory, and which the whole Territory of Dakota indorsed. That is the point of the case.

The action of the municipality there repudiating its indebtedness, if permitted to stop there, would simply be the isolated case of that municipality; but when the Supreme Court of the United States had decided in favor of the bonds, bonds which they themselves induced parties to buy—and here is the evidence of it—bonds which they themselves put upon the market for the purpose of raising money to build a railroad that opened to them the civilization of the world; after all this had been done at their own instance and request, and the Supreme Court had decided that these bonds were honestly due and should be paid, then what was the result? After they had exhausted all legal remedy in the tribunal of last resort in the Union, the Territorial Legislature passed this act and nullified the decision of the Supreme Court, and the very people who are here to-day asking for a territorial government were parties to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, right there will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Has he any record to show first that any territorial representative from Northern Dakota voted for that bill?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir. If the Senator wants the record I can produce it.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I want to ask a second question, whether he believes the people of that Territory should be denied territorial representation because their member or members of the Legislature did not vote in the way that he thinks would be consistent with right and justice upon a particular law?

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Indiana will possess his soul in patience, I think I will remove any doubt upon that question. After the Supreme Court of the United States had decided in favor of this indebtedness, and in terms so emphatic and distinct that there could be no question in regard to it; after they had said the judgment of the supreme court of the Territory shall be reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to reverse the judgment of the district court and direct judgment for the plaintiff on the facts as for such amount as shall appear to be due on the coupons sued for; after all that had been done, and there was but one solitary thing for honest people to do without nullification, and that was to pay the money and meet this judgment of the Supreme Court, the governor of that Territory called the Territorial Legislature together. They proceeded, then, without one dissenting voice, with a unanimous vote, a unanimous Legislature, to nullify the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to say to that tribunal, "Your judgment shall go for nothing inside the territorial limits of the Territory of Dakota." They nullified it by passing certain acts which put it in the power of those municipalities to evade and destroy absolutely the judgment of the Supreme Court.

But before I read that act let me say to the Senator from Indiana that he knows as I know that the very gentlemen who apply now for this territorial government appeared before the Committee on Territories in connection with the same gentlemen who proposed a State government for Southern Dakota and defended this very legislation. They were asked in regard to their part of the indebtedness, one hundred of them being present, Northern Dakota being fully represented, and they defended this very action and said to this committee that there had been some little unpleasantness about the bonds, but the thing was all settled. How was it settled? It was settled by their passing acts of that Legislature which nullified the decision of the Supreme Court, and which makes it impossible to-day to collect one dollar of that honest indebtedness.

The Senator asks what did Northern Dakota have to do with it? Has Northern Dakota ever protested? Did not Northern Dakota help to pass the law? Did not Northern Dakota appear before our committee and defend it? What else could they do? Has there ever been any protest or any statement here that they had nothing to do with this legislation? The whole Territory stand by it as they stood by it then. Now let us see what they did do. The Senator from Indiana says there was nothing in the act which allowed these officers to resign so that the process of the courts should not be served upon them.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator whether their resignation would not have been sufficient.

Mr. VEST. No. The law was that they should remain in office until their successors were duly elected and qualified; but they determined that they would not stay in office. They resigned in order to avoid the mandamus of the United States court, refusing to levy any tax to pay this judgment. They then met at daylight in the morning, and in the fog and dew they levied a tax for ordinary territorial purposes and left out any tax to pay this judgment.

Mr. HARRISON. Lest the Senate may misunderstand, the gentlemen you are speaking of now are the county commissioners of Yankton County.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir. They did that under this law, and under a law which Northern Dakota passed. That is the point. They did it with the instrumentality that these very gentlemen applying here to-day put into their hands. Here was the act:

CHAPTER 137.—RESIGNATIONS.

An act to amend section 1 of chapter 22 of the political code.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

SECTION 1. [Resignation of elective county officers.] That subdivision 4 of section 1 of chapter 22 of the political code be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "4. Of all elective officers by filing or depositing such resignation in writing in the office of the county clerk, except that of county clerk, which shall be filed or deposited with the board of county commissioners, which resignation, unless a different time is fixed therein, shall take effect upon such filing or deposit."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

Approved February 12, 1881.

(See Session Laws of Dakota for 1881, page 219.)

In other words, in order to evade this judgment they left the county without any county officers at all; and it remained in that condition, disorganized and without any political organization at all, for months and months for the simple and sole purpose of carrying out this repudiating intent. But more than that, here is the act which did the mischief; here is the act upon which they relied. There was not a solitary vote from Northern Dakota against it:

CHAPTER 54.—COUNTIES—JUDGMENT AGAINST.

An act to amend section 14 of chapter 21 of the political code.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

SECTION 1. [Power of commissioners to assess tax.] That section 14 of chapter 21 of the political code be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. When any judgment is obtained against a county the board of county commissioners shall have power, at any time after the expiration of six months from the rendition thereof, to assess and collect a sufficient amount of revenue, under the provisions of said chapter 21, to pay off and discharge said judgment, in addition to the ordinary expenses of the county. But the property of the county and of persons owning property, situated or liable to taxation therein, shall in no case be subject to judgment lien or liens, nor to seizure or sale upon execution or other process of any court."

SEC. 2. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

Indorsed: "Received at executive office, February 11, at 5.30 p. m."

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY OF THE TERRITORY.

The foregoing act having been presented to the governor of the Territory for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the Council of the Legislative Assembly, in which it originated, within the time prescribed by the organic act, has become a law without his approval.

GEO. H. HAND,
Secretary of the Territory.

(See Session Laws of Dakota, 1881, pages 63 and 64.)

This act was passed after the judgment of the Supreme Court was rendered, and it provides in the first place that for six months the county commissioners shall have no power to levy any tax at all to pay a judgment, and it provides in the second place that even if they do under a mandamus of the Supreme Court or the circuit court of the United States levy such a tax it shall be absolutely null and void, because no property of the municipality and the property of no individual in the municipality shall ever be taken for the payment of that judgment under mandamus. By that act they absolutely nullified the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is worth to-day not the paper on which it is written unless this act of the Territorial government of Dakota is wiped out of existence. And yet in the face of that, with this great abuse, with this outrageous violation of the confidence placed in them by the Congress of the United States, they have the insufferable impertinence to come here and ask for another territorial government, and the Senator from Indiana wants to know the reason why these people should not be again trusted. I point to that statute-book; I point to the degradation that they have brought upon the judiciary of the United States; I point to the stigma they have inflicted upon common honesty and public credit; and I ask now if this Congress is to put in the hands of these men the very same trust which they have before violated and outraged. Sir, are we to be told that we cannot investigate the conduct of a territorial organization when a part of that same organization comes here and asks now to be given the very same powers which they had before misused?

But, sir, I do not propose to elaborately discuss this matter. I have the proof, the documentary proof of every assertion that I have made. I can show it by the record of the Territorial Legislature. The Senator from Indiana knows that common cause was made by Southern and Northern Dakota for these two bills. They are part and parcel of the same legislative scheme. The Senator from Nebraska had two bills to report, one for a territorial government in Northern Dakota and the other for the admission of Southern Dakota as a State. When he found that opposition, and strenuous opposition, was made to the admission of Dakota as a State on the grounds which I have imperfectly delineated here to-day, then the Senator falls back upon his territorial bill, and if that is carried and a new territory is organized under this act, then it follows as a logical deduction that the State of Dakota must come in in spite of the legislation to which I have referred. I submit to the representatives of sovereign States whether you can take one single step toward the admission of a State (because its territorial form is simply its childhood, afterward to be perfected in the form of a State government) with this legislation unrepealed and unrepented, standing here to-day before the world defended by the people, defended by the authorities, with incipient candidates for the Senate and for Congress and for governor upon these very bills. I submit to the Senate whether the representatives of sovereign States can afford to take even one step toward the creation of a State with a people entertaining such sentiments and such practices?

It is not for me to allude to debates in the past when the party to which I belong has been stigmatized as the party of repudiation. It is not for me to allude to those heroic declamations we have heard here in favor of public credit and public honesty. The Southern States have been denounced as repudiating organizations and communities, because under the insufferable agony of degradation and bankruptcy, brought on by an unfortunate war, they have not met their obligations. Municipalities in the Northwest have failed to meet their indebtedness, but I say now and here, and I pledge myself as a public man to it, that I shall be true to the record that I have always made upon this subject of repudiation. I will never vote for any Territory, I will never vote for any State which comes to Congress stained with repudiation as these people of Dakota stand to-day. If they want to show themselves fit for a territorial government let them get rid of the acts which under the territorial government they have placed upon the statute-books.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator vote for the bill if the amendment of the Senator from Maine is accepted?

Mr. VEST. With certain amendments and with very considerable amendments, I might be induced to vote for this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Missouri yield for a motion to go into executive session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. VEST. I yield to that motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope a vote will be taken on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 25, noes 15.

Mr. ROLLINS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM. I am paired generally with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] This seems to be taking rather a political cast, but the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] is not here, and with the approbation of his colleague I have paired Mr. HAMPTON with Mr. LOGAN. I vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] and withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.] I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GARLAND, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I withdraw my vote. I do not know how the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] would vote if here. I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with him.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I withdraw my vote also, as I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Beck,	Farley,	Maxey,	Vest,
Brown,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Grover,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Call,	Hale,	Pugh,	Williams.
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Jonas,	Slater,

NAYS—25.

Aldrich,	Frye,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Chilcott,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Windom.
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt,

Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Davis of Illinois,	Hampton,	Logan,	Van Wyck.
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	McDill,
Fair,	Johnston,	McPherson,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 5, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of Monday's proceedings was read and approved.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SHREVEPORT.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business coming over by unanimous consent from Monday is the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 750) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana, and pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected, a suitable building of bricks or stone, with fire-proof vaults, for the accommodation of the post-office, United States courts, internal-revenue, Signal Service, customs, and other Government officers at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana; and that for this purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, upon the passage of this act, cause the proper plans and specifications to be made, so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the purchase of a site and the full completion of said building beyond the sum herein appropriated upon the plans to be previously approved by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be expended until a valid title to the site of said building, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least fifty feet, including streets and alleys, shall be vested in the United States, and until the State of Louisiana shall duly relinquish and release its jurisdiction over the same, and its right to tax said site and the property thereon belonging to the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana if there is any limitation fixed upon the cost of this building before the amount appropriated can be made available? There is nothing said about the limitation as far as I have been able to gather from the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that this is a Senate bill and appropriates $100,000, which is the total amount to be expended for the construction of this public building. It passed the Senate in the early part of April, and came here as a Senate bill. It found here upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union a similar bill which had been unanimously reported favorably by the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, agreeing to the same sum of $100,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the point to which I desire to call attention. My friend will notice, as I gather from the reading of the bill, that there is no limitation as to the cost of this building.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I presume it had better be understood that a second is ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it will be so understood.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. What I desire to call attention to is that I believe there is no limitation except the appropriation of $100,000 named in the bill——

Mr. BLOUNT. I would ask the gentleman from Louisiana if he has any objection to limiting the expenditure to $100,000?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have no objection to it whatever; but an examination of the bill will show that it is already limited to $100,000, and there is no necessity for such an amendment. If an amendment is adopted it will compel the bill to go back to the Senate for concurrence; and as there is no need for the amendment, I do not wish it to take that course and risk its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the gentleman misapprehends altogether my purpose. The present law provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not allow the expenditure of any money for such purposes until there is a limit fixed to the expenditure for construction. I move to add as an amendment to this bill that the cost of the building shall not exceed $100,000.

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana would not now be in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds if it is not usual to place a limit in bills providing for the construction of public buildings?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Invariably.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This bill limits the amount, as will be seen, to $100,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I find on examining that it provides that—

For this purpose there is hereby appropriated $100,000; * * * and that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the purchase of a site and the full completion of said building beyond the sum herein appropriated, &c.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire, in order that the House may act with its usual moderation in these matters, that the gentleman from Louisiana will explain the necessity for this building.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will do it with pleasure. If my friend from Michigan had read the RECORD of yesterday morning, he would not have needed to ask an explanation of the bill, for I carefully prepared, and by consent of the House had printed in the RECORD a statement giving the reasons and necessities for the erection at Shreveport of this building. I will say to my friend from Michigan that there is but one public building in the State of Louisiana, belonging to the Federal Government, and that is in New Orleans. That was constructed something like forty years ago. Since that time it has paid for itself over and over again, so that so far as the General Government is concerned it is not out of pocket any money for the construction of public buildings in Louisiana.

The city of Shreveport is the second city in importance in the State of Louisiana. It is in the southwestern part of the State, while New Orleans is in the southeastern portion. The United States courts are held at Shreveport. It is the headquarters of the internal-revenue department of that district and the internal revenue collected there averages about $30,000 a year, as I am informed by the deputy collector. The post-office at Shreveport does quite an important business and pays over $5,000 a year net revenue to the Government. Besides this, there is a marine hospital established there; there is a signal service or meteorological office, and some years ago it was made a port of delivery, and there is a customs officer stationed there continually. The Secretary of the Treasury, over his own signature, shows that the rental paid for the public buildings now used there by the Government amounts to about $1,800 a year, and the accommodations thus provided are entirely inadequate.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman from Louisiana when the United States courts were authorized to be held in that city?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that before the war Louisiana constituted two Federal judicial districts, and that since the war up to 1880 it only constituted one district, and the Federal courts were held only in the city of New Orleans. But in the Forty-sixth Congress the State was divided into two judicial districts, the eastern and the western, and Shreveport is the principal city of the western district.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. That law was passed, I believe, on the 3d of March last year.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was passed in the Forty-sixth Congress, but the exact date I am not able now to give, not having been a member of that House. The district judge, I will say, lives in that city, and also the district attorney.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I only desire to say a word with reference to this matter. The western district of Louisiana was established on the 3d day of March a year ago. The act establishing that district went into effect on the 1st day of July, so that it has only been about a year since that district was established. By the act creating the western district the United States courts were authorized to be held at four different places in that district—Alexandria, Shreveport, Monroe, and some other place—perhaps the gentleman can state what it is.

Mr. ELLIS. Opelousas.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. United States courts were authorized to be held at four different places in that district. Now I submit this to the attention of the House, whether we are not acting hastily in erecting a public building at Shreveport within one year after the district is created, before we can know what ought to be known as to the point where business would naturally center. I am advised that the entire expense of these four courts—three perhaps only have been held in the year—is a little over $12,000 for the whole district, including marshals' fees, witness fees, and jurors' fees—something over $12,000. There was no business whatever at Shreveport in July, 1881, as appears by the report of the district attorney.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What does the gentleman state?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The report of the district attorney for the July term, 1881, shows there was no criminal business at that point.

Mr. ELLIS. That shows the morality and virtue of the people.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman by reference to the report will observe that there were cases on the docket.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. There were some cases on the docket, but they were not tried. The report of the district attorney for the May term of this year, which I saw this morning, states there was not sufficient business to justify the drawing of a jury. That was in May, at Shreveport. At Monroe there were over eighty cases. And there seems to be greater reason for erecting a public building at some other point, I will say to my friend from Louisiana, than at Shreveport; for while the report shows there was no business, or very little business, at Shreveport, at other points, or at least at one point, there were nearly one hundred cases on the calendar.

I simply submit to the House and to my friend from Louisiana whether we are not acting prematurely in erecting a public building at Shreveport within one year after the district is created and when by the law the court is to be held at four different places in that district? Would it not be well to wait until we see where the business would center, and we can then erect the building at the point where it seems most to be demanded?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that in May, when the United States district court held its sittings there, it was during the period when that country, or a large part of it, was under water. And I will say to him that if a jury had been drawn to attend that Federal court on that occasion it would have been with the greatest difficulty that jurymen could have gotten there.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to say that in the month of July there were no criminal cases pending, as appears by the report of the district attorney.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say to the gentleman that the parish of Caddo, of which Shreveport is the county seat, is, next to the parish of Orleans, the richest parish in the State. The State district court sits there the entire year, with the exception of three months in the summer; and the only reason in the world that there was not a crowded docket of the Federal district court in May was that that was the first time under the rules of the court, after this court was established, that the term was held, and you know where a term is held for the first time in a city there are very few cases on the docket. But the fact that the State district court—that parish constituting one State judicial district—sits the entire year round, and that its docket is crowded with cases, goes to show that is the place outside of the city of New Orleans where there is the greatest amount of litigation.

I yield to my colleague, [Mr. ELLIS.]

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to state that Shreveport, doing a very large business with the States of Texas and Arkansas, selling and buying goods in those two States, and also having commercial relations with the Indian Territory, there is bound to be a great deal of Federal business in the Federal court at Shreveport. And, Mr. Speaker, I do not know why this opposition should spring up, when, day after day and time after time, public buildings are voted to towns and villages with not one-fourth of the population, with not one-tenth, ay, not one-twentieth, of the commercial importance of Shreveport—to Harrisonburgh and places like that, and a place in Illinois where there is no Federal court at all.

Mr. RYAN. And two places in Missouri where there are no Federal courts.

Mr. ELLIS. That there is no criminal business speaks well for the morals and virtue of that most excellent community, and I trust there never will be any criminal business on its docket. But there is bound to be very large and very important litigation, especially in cases arising from the river, involving questions of maritime jurisdiction, while the fact that the State district court occupies the court-house nearly the entire year will not permit it to be used for the United States court, as is the case at Monroe. Now, Monroe has a large and commodious court-house which can be used for the Federal court, the State court not using it more than four months in the year, while the State district court and the supreme court, sitting in Shreveport, occupy its court-house nearly the entire year.

I ask the House to vote for this bill and pass it as a matter of justice and a matter of right.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill which has been read.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were ayes 82, noes 32.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It seems to me that we had better have tellers on that motion; it will not take long.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] calls for tellers.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point that no quorum has voted; that will settle the question of tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLANCHARD and Mr. BRAGG were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 113, noes 33.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 6241) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for prior years, and for those certified as due by the accounting officers of the Treasury in accordance with section 4 of the act of June 14, 1878, heretofore paid from permanent appropriations, and for other purposes.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask consent that the general deficiency appropriation bill, just returned from the Senate with amendments, be printed with the Senate amendments numbered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DUTIES ON SUGAR AND MOLASSES.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6717) to repeal so much of an act approved March 3, 1875, as imposes additional duties on sugars and molasses; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON, ETC.

Mr. ALDRICH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6718) to donate two condemned cannon and twelve cannon-balls to the A. E. Burnside Post No. 109 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of South Chicago, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BIDS FOR MAIL ROUTES.

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6719) to amend section 3953 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. ROBESON. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one minute.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAGE in the chair.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes. The pending amendment is the one offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED,] and will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 17 of the printed bill, strike out all after the word "provided," in line 396, to and including the word "and," in line 399; also strike out the word "it," in line 399, and insert in lieu thereof the words "the foregoing sum;" also strike out the words "appraised value of the same," in line 401, and insert in lieu thereof the words "the estimated cost of a new vessel of the same size and of like material;" so that it will read:

"Provided, That none of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new vessel of the same size and of like material."

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a point of order on that proviso before the amendment is voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. My point of order is that the proviso changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is too late to make the point of order now against the proviso.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all.

Mr. REED. It is too late to make it against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will state his point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is that the proviso changes the existing law in many particulars. First, where it declares that "not more than $400,000 of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ships;" second, that "none of it shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the same;" and also that "any part of the appropriation not used for repairs may be applied toward the construction of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance with the recommendation of the naval advisory board."

The first two propositions I object to because they change existing law and provide that certain things shall be done which now may not be done, and do not retrench expenditures. The last proposition in reference to construction of new cruising vessels is in violation of the statute which provides that no contract shall be made by the Navy Department until an appropriation shall be made adequate to its fulfillment. It is not claimed here that the appropriation is adequate to the fulfillment of this contract. On the contrary, the commencement of these vessels is authorized out of a part of this fund.

Mr. HISCOCK. This proposition has been under consideration and an amendment has been offered to it and the amendment voted upon. It is too late now to make the point of order.

Mr. REED. You might as well make the point of order next week.

Mr. BLOUNT. An amendment was offered, but not to all of these propositions. I do not understand that because an amendment has been offered to one part of a section which is not liable to a point of order, therefore a point of order cannot be made against another part. All points of order were reserved on all of these provisions before we went into Committee of the Whole.

I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to which reference has been made is simply a proposition to strike out the provision as to the 30 per cent., and nothing more. It was also agreed in Committee of the Whole that this provision should be passed over and taken up to-day.

Mr. ROBESON. That proposition and agreement, I will remind the gentleman, were not made until after the amendment had been offered, voted on, and carried, and the point of no quorum made.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then nothing has been done.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order, as I understand, applies to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have made, if the gentleman will allow me, several points of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine refers, as I remember, to the 30 per cent. provision. My point relates to several other propositions. It would be singular if, where there are several legal propositions, and to one of those a point of order is not made, but an amendment, the vote on that amendment precludes the consideration of a point of order as to the other succeeding propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion, from an examination of the RECORD and from his recollection of what occurred, that the point of order comes too late. When this clause of the bill was reached no point of order was made against it. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] then offered an amendment to perfect the text, to which there was no point of order; and the gentleman proceeded to debate his amendment. Therefore the Chair is clearly of opinion that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the Chair rule that it is too late to raise a point of order as to every proposition of law in this paragraph, or simply that it is too late to raise a point upon the proposition to which the amendment of the gentleman from Maine relates?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that question when it arises. The point of order which the Chair understands the gentleman now to make is against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all; my point of order goes to the several legal propositions in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now too late, the Chair holds, to raise a point of order against the paragraph, as an amendment to it has been offered and discussed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do I understand the Chair to hold that where there are three distinct propositions and an amendment has been offered to one it is necessary before that amendment is disposed of that a point of order shall be raised on the several succeeding propositions or the right to do so is forfeited? I ask this question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that as this matter was passed over, and by agreement the gentleman from Maine offered an amendment to perfect the text of the paragraph, and as there was no point of order made at the time, the point of order now comes too late. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do I understand the Chair to rule that every succeeding proposition is subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule upon succeeding points of order when made.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have made a point of order on the succeeding propositions; and I simply desire to understand the ruling of the Chair, which I trust I may be allowed to do.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose that when a bill has been read to a certain point and an amendment is offered and considered it is too late to make a point of order upon what has been read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not understand the gentleman's argument to go as far as that of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read from the RECORD the proceedings upon this matter.

Mr. TALBOTT. The entire paragraph was read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care, increase, and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair, and incidental expenses, namely, advertising and foreign postage, $1,750,000: Provided, That not more than $400,000 of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ships, and that none of it shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the same; and any part of the said appropriation not used for repairs may be applied toward the construction of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance with the recommendation of the naval advisory board, as approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives in their report, numbered 653, made to the House of Representatives March 8, 1882.

Mr. REED. I desire to move an amendment to this paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me to suggest that we are now entering upon the consideration of the construction clause of the bill and there is a very thin House here.

Mr. ROBESON. We can perfect the text.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to impede the bill in any way, and yet I feel that we ought to have a fuller House to consider it than we now have. We might pass over this portion for the present.

Mr. REED. Let my amendment be read.

Mr. HISCOCK. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is really to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

"Strike out these words:

"'Provided, That not more than $400,000 of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ships, and that none of it shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship where the expense of such repairs shall exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the same.'

"And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'Provided, That none of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the repair of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new vessel of the same size.'"

Mr. ATKINS. I think that before the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is considered we should determine whether we intend to appropriate $1,750,000 for this Bureau of Construction and Repair, as provided in this bill.

Mr. REED. I would like to submit some remarks on my amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. For myself I am not in favor of giving that much.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read from the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

But after a question has been stated and its discussion commenced, it is too late to raise the question of consideration.—Journal, 1, 17, pages 296, 297.

[It is too late, after the House has proceeded to the consideration of a proposition, to make a "point of order" that such proposition is not in order under the rules.]

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not my point. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk again read the amendment of Mr. REED.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask to be heard a single moment. The ruling which the Chair has had read is that where an amendment has been offered and debated a point of order does not lie. I am not making a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine. I acted under that very rule. I do not think that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine is liable to the point of order at this time. When that shall have been disposed of, it seems to me, the rule will then operate on the balance of the paragraph. But it was not to his amendment I made the point of order; and if it will be more satisfactory to the Chair I will wait until it is acted on, and then raise the question of order. It is to the bill I am making the point of order, and the rule relates to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the question which was being considered to be on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine. [Mr. BLOUNT rose.] In a moment. The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to raise the point of order that it changed existing law, and it was on that point of order the Chair ruled. It has not ruled on the other question, but will when the time comes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt the ruling of the Chair is correct. If I lose no right by doing so, I am willing to wait until the amendment of the gentleman from Maine is acted on. But I desire to reserve all points of order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It must not be assumed by our silence the gentleman from Georgia is correct, because I am of opinion he is manifestly wrong. When he says he does not waive anything he must not take it for granted we assent to his proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not trying to gain any advantage. I reserve all points of order in order that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine may be acted on, and in order that I may be under no disadvantage.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing my friend shall reserve all points of order he has, but we do not want him to get anything he has not now.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Georgia does not reserve anything when he reserves the point of order, for after the consideration of a question it is impossible to raise a question of order on it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman misunderstands me. I am not reserving any question of order on his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia, the Chair understands, reserves his rights under the rule and nothing more.

Mr. REED. He is entitled to those.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment in connection with the text of the bill be again reported to the House, so we may understand exactly what will be its effect if adopted.

The amendment was read as suggested.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not like to trouble the House, but I should like to have that amendment again read. It is a very important one, and it should be thoroughly understood before it is adopted.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ATKINS. As I suggested to the gentleman from Maine when this bill was last up, it would seem it would be more regular for the House to consider first what sum it would appropriate, and therefore I suggested to the gentleman the other day to make a motion to reduce the amount to $1,500,000.

Mr. REED. What is it?

Mr. ATKINS. The appropriation in the bill is $1,750,000. I propose an amendment reducing the sum to $1,500,000.

Mr. REED. We had better take the matter up in its regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. That would be the regular order, because we have passed over the sum appropriated, and the gentleman moves to amend the proviso, the appropriation preceding that proviso.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman in charge of the bill desires this to be put on as expressive of the sentiments of the committee. He desires it to be adopted as part of the presentation of the matter to the House, and therefore perhaps it will be well to adopt that, and then we can take up the next question.

Mr. ATKINS. If that is the wish of the gentleman, I yield.

Mr. REED's amendment was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I send to the Chair a substitute for the whole of the section.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer a substitute.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the point of order I suggested awhile ago. Mr. REED'S amendment does not touch any part of the appropriation——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot understand when there is so much confusion and two or three gentlemen are talking at the same time. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] offered an amendment, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] rose to a point of order against the entire paragraph. The Chair will hear the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Georgia will yield to allow this to be read, he will perceive that the amendment which I offer is one covering the balance of this portion of the bill and includes the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and just adopted by the committee. The point of order the gentleman seeks to make lies against the amendment, as I understand it, incorporated in the section, and will not be involved or interfered with by allowing this amendment to be considered first.

Mr. BLOUNT. We will come to that in due order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. It is in due order now.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, we differ about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia to state the point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. The point of order that I make is against that portion of this provision which provides that—

Any part of the said appropriation not used for repairs may be applied toward the construction of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance of the recommendation of the naval advisory board as approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, &c.

The point I make is that this provision of the bill changes existing law. The statute——

Mr. HISCOCK. It is understood, Mr. Chairman, that the question as to whether this point of order is made in time is not waived. I make the point of order now that the gentleman from Georgia delayed making the point of order against this paragraph of the bill until too late; and I wish it to be understood that that question is not waived.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is simply hearing the gentleman from Georgia on his point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the point of order, heretofore made, that he is too late in making this point of order is not waived.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend replies to the point of order before I get through.

Mr. HISCOCK. No, I am not replying to the point of order, but simply calling attention to the fact that the gentleman from Georgia is undertaking to discuss this point upon its merits. If that be so, the first question to be considered is whether the point of order was made in time.

Mr. BLOUNT. If allowed to proceed, Mr. Chairman, I will state my question of order before the gentleman from New York undertakes to decide upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to call the attention of the Chair in this connection to section 3732 of the Revised Statutes, in the following words:

No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made unless the same is authorized by law, or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Departments for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.

Now, here is authority to provide for the commencement of the construction of certain vessels not authorized by this statute or any existing law. Here is authority to proceed to make contracts for the construction of vessels, without any allegation, assertion, or pretense that the sum here claimed will do anything more than merely commence them. I therefore make the point of order without entering into a further discussion of it, that this portion of this bill is not in order, is not in pursuance of existing law, and is a repeal of an existing statute.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Georgia is discussing the point of order or the merits of the proposition, and whether the Chair is listening to him on that question; or whether the point of order of any character will lie against this provision of the bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. The proposition which seems to me to be obnoxious to the point of order I have already stated to the Chair.

Mr. ROBESON. I could not hear the statement of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. My point of order is that here is legislation on an appropriation bill which does not retrench expenditures, which legislation, pro tanto, repeals a section of the law which prohibits the making of any contract on behalf of the United States, or the appropriation of money therefor except in pursuance of law.

Mr. ROBESON. I understand the point of order as made by the gentleman from Georgia to refer to the authority for this legislation under the law, and does not embrace the question of the merits. It is simply a question of orderly and regular proceeding.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair, as I understand, has distinctly stated that the question of order previously made related to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, and if I understood him correctly there was no ruling as to any other portion of it.

Mr. ROBESON. No; and upon that proposition I desire to be heard if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of opinion without taking up the time of the committee in hearing further discussion, that the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia cannot now be entertained. When this paragraph of the bill was reached it was read by the Clerk, and an amendment was offered and discussed, and no point of order was made against the paragraph. Therefore the Chair decides that the point of order does not lie, for the reason that it is too late now to be entertained.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The Fourth of July has intervened between.

Mr. REED. And the rain-storm and fire-works.

Mr. BLOUNT. Gentlemen may have a good memory upon that point.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to strike out, in line 396, the words "seven hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred," so that it will read $1,500,000 instead of $1,750,000. That reduces the item of appropriation for the Bureau of Construction and Repair to the same amount as for the current and last year. Now this increase of $250,000 proposed in this bill is based upon an idea that one or two cruisers shall be constructed for the Navy; and it is, it seems to me, a question which the committee should now decide whether or not it intends——

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. I desire to ask whether the amendment which I sent to the desk a few moments since was not in order first. The gentleman from Tennessee is now offering an amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts rose to offer an amendment, but immediately preceding that the gentleman from Georgia had arisen to a point of order. The Chair entertained the point of order, and after deciding that recognized the gentleman from Tennessee to offer his amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I thought I was recognized and that my amendment was only waiting the decision of the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. An opportunity will be given for submitting all the amendments.

Mr. ATKINS. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs waived his right by failing to be on his feet to demand the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will proceed. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts in due time.

Mr. ATKINS. As I was proceeding to say, this increased appropriation, for that appears from the bill, is based on the idea of the construction of two vessels outright, and the committee must now determine whether or not it will commit itself to the proposition of building two new vessels before it takes action upon this appropriation. The sum of $1,500,000 is certainly enough for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, if none of it is to be applied to the construction of new vessels. Indeed, it may be said that in view of the fact that there has been a general reduction in the other bureaus, this bureau might share something of a reduction. But I do not ask that. I only ask to put it at what it was before and what it is now. And I want this question to be sharply brought before the committee in voting upon this increase of $250,000, or for this bill giving $1,750,000. I want the issue sharply brought before the committee whether or not it intends to appropriate money for the erection of two new vessels.

Now, sir, I think an appropriation bill is not the proper place to consider the great question of the reorganization of the Navy. This is a proposition to commence rebuilding the navy. And I do not think, sir, that the proper place for that is in considering an appropriation bill. We have had too many precepts, we have had too many lectures, we have had too many lessons read to us on that side of the House for the committee now to commit itself, especially as that side has the majority, to that theory and that practice.

I think, sir, if we are to begin a navy we had better begin it right away. It is certainly a matter of sufficient importance to command the attention of Congress. It is no unimportant matter; it is a very important matter and one that should receive attention to itself and not be mixed up with an appropriation bill. I hope, sir, the committee will decide to take a different course and not attempt to begin to reconstruct the American Navy by amendments to appropriation bills. If the committee will so decide, if that should be its judgment, then there is no necessity for this increased appropriation. And now, as I see the hammer about to fall, I say again, let it be understood that if the appropriation is to be increased to $1,750,000, it is the judgment of this committee that these two new vessels shall be built. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. What I intended to say has been pretty well said by my colleague from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] That is to say, on this proposition made by himself the issue is sharply defined which will be presented, I understand, in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS.]

If you intend to build a new navy or enter upon the construction of cruisers, then you are appropriating too small an amount of money, and you have not now the time, nor is this the occasion, to deliberately consider what character that future navy should be. What now you ought to do, as has been said by my colleague, is to appropriate simply a sum sufficient to sustain the actual navy as it exists now, and then at the proper time, and upon the proper occasion, enter upon the question as to the future character of the navy.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] intends, as I learn from the amendment proposed, and which I have seen in the RECORD, to present this issue. For the nonce I shall be with my colleague from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] and vote in favor of a reduction; but if the motion of my colleague is defeated, then I say, if you intend to make this experiment, you should make it with the liberality contemplated by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, rose.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will perfect my amendment. In addition to striking out $1,750,000, in line 396, and inserting $1,500,000, I move to strike out from line 401 to line 409, namely, these words:

> And any part of the said appropriation not used for repairs may be applied toward the construction of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance with the recommendation of the naval advisory board, as approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives in their report, numbered 653, made to the House of Representatives March 8, 1882.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] and his colleague [Mr. WHITTHORNE] had allowed the amendment I offered, and which was certainly pending when the point of order was decided, to be read, they would have seen the purpose of that amendment. You have ruled, Mr. Chairman, that this appropriation for new vessels is in order. The Committee on Appropriations have given but $1,750,000 for the repair of the old vessels, and the purchase of materials, and the commencement of new cruisers. Now, the amendment which I offered does not increase the appropriation a dollar, but it provides safeguards for the expenditure of that money——

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say that I reserve the point of order on the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has not yet been read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The amendment which I offer throws around this appropriation, whatever it may be, whether $200,000 or $500,000—it must be a very small sum—the guards and protection which the Naval Committee have thrown around the appropriation of $10,000,000 in their bill. We have provided for an advisory board as there intended, and we have provided in the amendment which is offered that this advisory board shall not only prepare the plans for the new cruisers, but shall be engaged in preparing estimates and plans for the other vessels recommended by the advisory board. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it is in order to commence the construction of a new navy with any sum, this House ought certainly to be willing to give the Secretary of the Navy $400,000 or $500,000, for that is all this bill will do, to commence the construction of two of the best ships recommended by the Naval Committee. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will not be adopted. I had intended to move an amendment to appropriate $5,000,000 for this purpose instead of $1,750,000 recommended in the bill. But out of deference to the wish of the Committee on Appropriations I shall not move that amendment.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] has said that this is not the proper place to consider a question of this importance. I would like to remind that gentleman of the fact that the Committee on Naval Affairs, through its chairman, submitted a proposition to the House to suspend the rules and fix a day for the consideration of House bill No. 5001, and also a bill, the number of which I now forget, to create a permanent construction fund for the Navy. That motion to suspend the rules failed to obtain a two-thirds vote.

Now, it will not do for a gentleman who voted against the Naval Committee, having a day to consider these important measures, to tell us now that we should not consider this important subject on an appropriation bill. This subject should be considered by the Committee of the Whole, and by the House, and by Congress.

It is proposed by this bill to appropriate $15,000,000 to maintain and provide for the pay of an admiral and vice-admiral and other officers of the Navy down to petty officers and seamen, when in fact according to the statement of the Admiral of the Navy, you have not a single vessel to-day that could stand up and make a fight against the vessel of the English navy which is considered a failure, the Warrior, built some ten years ago. Why did not these gentlemen vote to give us a day for the consideration of a bill providing for the reconstruction of the Navy? I hope the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will be voted down. And I hope that the Chair will overrule the point of order raised against the amendment of my colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] and will rule that that amendment is in order.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, has presented the question squarely to the House. The amendment which he has moved raises the simple question whether we shall have any navy or not.

As the appropriation bill came to us last year and the year before, it was designed to give us no new navy, to give us no more effective naval force, no different kinds of ships, no more powerful armament. As the bill is presented this year it is designed to begin a new system in the Navy, to provide for new iron and steel cruising vessels.

The result of the policy which was carried out in the appropriation bill of last year, as everybody admits to be true, is that we have no respectable navy and we are not trying to provide for any. The proposition in this appropriation bill is an endeavor in the right direction.

We have not gone to the full extent of what was recommended unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House, including members of that committee from both sides of the House, because we did not care to load down an annual appropriation bill with more money than was necessary for that particular fiscal year. But we have adopted the policy as recommended by that Naval Committee, and as was approved by this House by a vote of 145 to 90.

Under that recommendation of the Naval Committee, under the recommendation of the Navy Department, under the recommendation of the advisory board, and under the recommendation of this House, the Committee on Appropriations has adopted that policy, and has put on this bill what we thought was necessary for that purpose to be spent during the current fiscal year. If that policy is to be accepted by the House the sum here named must not be reduced. If it is not to be accepted, if the American Congress now means to vote that the American Republic shall before the world have no navy to protect its commerce or to vindicate its honor, then the proposition should be voted down.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope he does not intend to say that we have no navy now.

Mr. ROBESON. I mean to say that the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House in their report says that we have no navy now at all comparable to other navies of the world. All our navy now is of wood, and it requires a constant yearly expenditure to repair it. It requires almost as much of the $1,500,000 to keep it afloat as it would to commence the building of a new navy.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does the gentleman say there are no iron-clads?

Mr. ROBESON. I say there are fourteen iron-clads.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman said our navy was all wood.

Mr. ROBESON. That has nothing to do with this subject. We have iron-clads for the protection of our coasts, but our cruising vessels are not iron.

Mr. BLOUNT. If any one will take the pains to read the report of the distinguished gentleman who had charge of this bill last year, as well as the report of the gentleman who has charge of this bill, his pride in the American Navy would be very greatly excited, and he would wonder how all of this denunciation came to be presented to the American people at this time.

I regret that the amendment of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] does not go further, and I shall at the proper time offer an amendment not only embracing this proposition, but the additional provision that not more than $400,000 of this appropriation shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship, and that none shall be so applied when the expense of such repairs would exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the ship.

I have been informed by officers of the Navy that the effect of this 30 per cent. provision would be to destroy all the wooden ships of the Navy; that we shall have none left, and will be obliged to resort to new and enormous contracts in order to have any navy at all.

But we have here not only a provision restricting repairs to vessels of that class, but an appropriation of the pitiful sum of $400,000 to repair your navy. Year after year we have been assailed from the other side of the House on the ground that we were not giving money enough to keep our navy in repair; yet here is a proposition in effect to sell out all that we have and to put ourselves in such a condition that we must of necessity resort to enormous expenditures to build up perhaps such a navy as the gentleman would have us build, a navy which will compare favorably with that of the great naval powers of the world.

This bill, while on its face it does not seem extravagant, carries with it the seeds of enormous expenditures, far beyond what now appear. I trust the Committee of the Whole will see fit to vote down all these provisions and leave us what we should have, simply a naval appropriation bill.

Why, sir, the only excuse that has been offered for this extravagant appropriation has been a reference to little, insolvent, powerless Chili. [Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. KASSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr.

SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6394) for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Texas; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing the appointment of Humphrey H. Lemon upon the Capitol police force.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 2096) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to George H. Thomas Post No. 18 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Ottawa, Kansas, four condemned cannon.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. HARRIS, of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, during this session I have paid some attention to the objects of the bill under consideration. It seems to me that it seeks to accomplish the secondary and unimportant at the expense and to the neglect of the necessary and important.

We are asked to complete the unfinished monitors, and that is all. Comparatively no attention is given in the direction in which we are most deficient and have made the least progress.

Projectile force has far advanced in recent years beyond devices for resistance. The Krupp gun can throw a ball through any feasible thickness of armor at seven miles distance. We have scarcely any of modern type—none in fact of high power and long range. And it would seem we are to have none, since the bill under consideration appropriates but $100,000 for steel rifled breech-loading cannon.

The testimony taken by the Naval Committee at this session shows that breech-loading rifled cannon of 10-inch caliber could be made in our own country in time if entered upon. I consider it a duty not to be delayed to provide, either by purchase abroad or construction at home, the guns to defend our great cities and the masses of wealth upon our shores. The sum appropriated it is needless to say is insufficient to provide the means to build a single gun of large caliber, and would not purchase five. The hammer for the purpose would cost a million, and it would take three years to build the necessary plant.

No provision is made for the construction of rams, now recognized as one of the two or three most valuable means for harbor defense. I remember the gentleman from New Jersey, my colleague, said the other day that the monitors were rams, but they would be unwieldy and ineffectual under many circumstances. The Naval Committee recommended the construction of one designed by Admiral Ammen and approved by the advisory board and by other high authority both in and out of the Navy. Its cost is but $500,000, and it is capable of construction in from eight to ten months. It can deliver at a speed of thirteen knots a blow of 69,000,000 pounds. A more terrible engine of destruction could not be devised.

No appropriation is made for torpedo boats. We have now but one, the Alarm, an experimental vessel, having a large smooth-bore gun. Sixty thousand dollars only is appropriated for the torpedo corps, and this is to cover labor, outfits, repairs to buildings, wharves, grounds, &c.

The remainder of $3,750,000, after being devoted to the variety of purposes of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, sufficient in their needs to absorb nearly the whole, is to be devoted to building two new cruisers of iron or steel. The Committee on Naval Affairs did not, as quoted in the report of the Committee on Appropriations, recommend iron. The testimony of officers of the Navy, ship-builders, and manufacturers of iron and steel was all in favor of steel and steel only, (page 22 of report.) So we see that the building of new fast steel cruisers, the purchase or construction of modern long-range rifled cannon, the building of rams, the construction of torpedo-boats and torpedoes, all of which are demanded by our age and time, are thrust aside and rendered subsidiary to the completion of the unfinished monitors. Whether they ought ever to be completed I have not for myself decided, because I am not sufficiently informed concerning them, but I will say that the testimony of some of our naval experts and the experience of other nations with vessels of the same class may well cause us to hesitate, especially when we have not yet begun to acquire the new great agents of naval warfare to which I have referred.

The amendment adopted the other day preventing promotion to the grade of lieutenant till the present number of two hundred and eighty is reduced by promotion to two hundred was, I think, improvident and unconsidered. It works a great injustice to a large number of officers below that grade, thrusting every one of them back five years, and some of them have been in the next grade eight or ten years.

It is a wrong to every master, ensign, midshipman, and cadet in the service.

I do not sympathize with the clamor about the "top-heaviness" of our Navy.

Maintaining none except to a very limited extent, because relying in case of emergency upon our ability to build or buy ships, it seems to me good policy to keep up our body of educated, skilled, and experienced officers, especially those who are young and vigorous. A naval officer is not made in a day nor a year. Long experience and technical education are absolute requisites. Let us keep them, so that when war comes (and when it comes it will be upon the sea) we shall have the men to uphold the honor of our arms.

Picayune economy always strikes a few dollars from the salary of a clerk or employé or minor officer, and votes lavish millions to gigantic schemes.

This is a great country, and with its fifty-five millions of people, its boundless wealth, its unmeasured resources, its vast extent, washed by the waves of two oceans, and locking within its borders five seas, needs its naval officers and can afford to maintain them. [Applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when the time of Mr. HARRIS, of New Jersey, had expired, Mr. HEWITT, of New York, obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. HARRIS, of New Jersey.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I move a pro forma amendment. I believe that measures should be taken to place our Navy on a proper footing. But I cannot agree with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] when, in his zeal for the passage of this bill, he says that had there been in the harbor of Callao last summer such an iron-clad as he would now build, the dismemberment of Peru need not have taken place. If I thought this was a correct conclusion it would have great influence in determining my vote upon this bill, because anything that we can do to better our position in South America I think ought to be done. But the gentleman is, I think, in error. I should be sorry to say so unless I were secure in the facts of the case, and I feel it incumbent upon me, therefore, to present those facts somewhat in detail.

The country has been surfeited with the scandals of Mr. Shipherd and his Peruvian company—scandals of which it is enough to say that they would have been impossible had the State Department always been administered with propriety and dignity. I do not now propose to speak of these scandals in detail. But there is a much more grave and important aspect of our South American relations, of which too little heed has been taken, and of which the mischievous significance is daily increasing.

We have lately heard a great deal of an alleged American policy. It should be understood, however, that the treatment of the questions arising out of the unfortunate war between Chili and Peru and Bolivia during the recent administration of the State Department contrived in the short space of six months not only to gamble away the moral influence of the United States in South America, and to discredit American diplomacy throughout that part of the world, but actually resulted in opening the way to a direct European interference in South American affairs and in giving a color of necessity to such an interference.

To make this perfectly clear I must ask the House to allow me to sketch the story of these South American troubles as briefly as the nature of the subject will permit and as plainly as I am able to do.

In the year 1879 war broke out between the Republic of Chili and the allied republics of Bolivia and Peru. This event attracted the anxious attention of three leading powers of Europe—England, France, and Germany—each of whom carries on an important trade with the west coast of South America, and each of whom has a direct pecuniary interest in the condition of these republics. Of the thousand millions of dollars to which in round numbers the aggregate public debts of the South American nations are estimated to amount, very nearly one-third, or about three hundred millions, are represented by the public debts of Chili, Bolivia, and Peru, Peru being much the more heavily indebted of the three states. The European creditors of the three republics were seriously alarmed at the outbreak of hostilities which could not fail to cripple the resources of their debtors, and the war had scarcely begun when overtures were made from Europe to the United States with the view of ascertaining whether something could not be done to end the conflict. The fact that the direct pecuniary interest of the European states in the re-establishment of peace was far greater than that of the United States, obviously offered the Government of this country a decided moral advantage in the work of amicable intervention to check the progress of the war, should it be deemed the policy of this Government to interfere at all. Of course, therefore, the creation of any important American claim on the resources of either of the belligerents was a thing to be avoided if order and prosperity were to be restored in South America through the influence of this country, especially when such a claim was of a doubtful character.

Bearing these facts in mind, let us now consider the progress of events.

THE WAR ON THE PACIFIC.

The conflict has been a contest for the practical control of the nitrate and guano trade of the world by means of the possession of the Province of Tarapaca, which lies within the boundaries of Peru and close to the territories of Chili and Bolivia.

The nitrates cannot be exported without considerable preparation; the Peruvian Government had, on this account, apportioned them among a number of foreign commercial houses, and had levied an export duty upon them.

The revenue thus obtained, though great, was insufficient for the purposes of the Peruvian Government, whose debt in 1860 amounted to twenty millions of dollars, and which had grown to more than two hundred and fifty millions at the breaking out of the war of 1879. It is said that half of this debt is held in England, and more than one-fourth of it in France and Holland. Harassed by the complaints of the bondholders, Peru tried to satisfy them by raising the export duty on the nitrates from eighty-eight cents to $2 per ton. Finding that even this strong measure failed to produce sufficient revenue, the Government of Peru reclaimed the nitrate beds from the foreign houses and assumed control of them itself.

The result of this experiment was precisely the result which always attends such government operations; the expense of production left only a nominal profit, and the national debt was largely increased. Moreover, new nitrate beds were discovered at Antafogasta, in Bolivia, which were ceded by the Bolivian Government to the Anglo-Chilian house of Gibbs & Co., and were worked with such success as to overstock the market and lower the price of the nitrates, thus adding to the financial difficulties of Peru.

In 1874 an old standing boundary question between Chili and Bolivia had been settled by a treaty under which Bolivia agreed to impose no new taxes on Chilian industries in the Bolivian districts of Antafogasta, Mejillones, Caracoles, and Salinas. In 1878 the Bolivian congress, holding that this agreement did not affect taxes previously levied and unpaid, insisted on collecting a considerable amount of taxes from the Anglo-Chilian houses at Antafogasta, and gave notice that in case of default the works there would be occupied and sold. Thereupon the Chilian minister at La Paz demanded his passports, and a Chilian force landing at Antafogasta drove out the Bolivian authorities without firing a shot and occupied the place. On this, Peru, as a neutral, in March, 1879, sent a special minister, Señor Lavalle, to Chili with offers of mediation.

The government at Santiago, having been informed that a secret alliance existed between Peru and Bolivia, interrogated Señor Lavalle on this point. He denied all knowledge of such a treaty. On the 14th of March the Chilian minister at Lima, Señor Godoy, received orders to demand a declaration of neutrality from Peru. Peru declined to make such a declaration at Lima, stating that Señor Lavalle had been sent to assure Chili of the neutrality of Peru. On the 24th of March the Chilian Government instructed Señor Godoy at Lima to insist that the question of Peruvian neutrality should be discussed not at Santiago, but at Lima, to demand an explanation of the Peruvian armaments, and to request an immediate and explicit avowal or disavowal of the alleged secret treaty between Peru and Bolivia. The Peruvian Government responded by avowing that a treaty conditional in its terms had been concluded between Peru and Bolivia February 6, 1873, with the object of strengthening the Peruvian Government's control of the nitrates, and that this treaty provided in its eighth article for arbitration in case of any international difficulty, and in its second article for an alliance in case the integrity of the territory either of Bolivia or Peru should be threatened. To this Chili replied that the case for an alliance had not occurred, as Chili "did not intend to conquer a hair's breadth of Bolivian territory;" and finally, considering herself really threatened by an alliance long before consummated, Chili, on the 7th of April, 1879, formally declared war against Peru.

The language of the eighth article of the treaty between Peru and Bolivia runs thus:

> The contracting parties bind themselves to employ with preference, whenever it is possible, conciliatory measures in order to avoid a rupture or to put an end to war, holding as the most effective the arbitration of a third power.

It is not necessary here to express an opinion as to which party at the outset of this war was in the right; it is enough to know that these were the circumstances in which it began.

THE TIME FOR OUR GOOD OFFICES.

Clearly this was an occasion when other powers might properly tender their good offices to the belligerents in order to make more easy some adjustment of the dispute, especially as arbitration was already provided for in the treaty of 1873 between Peru and Bolivia, and was not objected to by Chili in 1879. This important fact as to Chili appears from a conversation held at Santiago by Mr. Osborn, the American minister, with Mr. Fierro, the Chilian minister of foreign affairs, and reported to Mr. Evarts in a dispatch dated April 3, 1879, in which Mr. Osborn says:

> In response to a suggestion from Mr. Fierro, I remarked that I did not doubt that the United States Government would cheerfully lend its efforts to an amicable arrangement of the difficulties, if the governments engaged in the controversy should request it to do so.

Of this dispatch no notice whatever seems to have been taken by Mr. Evarts. Although familiar beyond most of our public men with the methods and the merits of the great principle of arbitration, as exemplified in those Geneva conferences in which he took so eminent a part, this opportunity for applying that principle to the immense advantage of three sister republics in South America, and to the honor and advantage also of the United States, seems entirely to have escaped his attention. He was not even reminded of it when, a fortnight afterward, April 19, 1879, Mr. Osborn sent to the State Department the war manifesto of Chili announcing the outbreak of these deplorable hostilities. The only notice taken of this communication appears to have been such a formal expression of conventional regret as might have been expected from the Government of Portugal or of Siam, and even this was uttered not by the Secretary of State, but by his assistant, Mr. Seward, in the following cool and indifferent terms:

> Whatever may have been the causes leading to this war, its commencement and continuance cannot but be regretted by the United States, and it is hardly necessary to add that the announcement of an early peace between the two governments, as also with Bolivia, would be news most welcome to the Government of the United States.

In justice to Mr. Evarts, I may here observe that, unlike his successor, he was for a time at least consistent in his course, or rather in his attitude; for he sat perfectly still and did not trouble himself to do anything until in June, 1879, about four months after the outbreak of hostilities, Lord Salisbury telegraphed to the British minister in Washington "that the English and German Governments greatly regretted the war, which was largely waged at the neutral powers' cost, and that he wished to know whether the United States Government would be disposed to join those two powers in offering their mediation." Mr. Evarts, who could find no time to reply to his own ministers on the subject of American arbitration between the belligerents, instantly replied to the appeal of the neutrals in the negative:

> This Government—
> He said—
> has been and is ready to assist in the restoration of peace between the belligerents whenever its good offices may be usefully proffered. It does not, however, favor a premature effort in combination with other neutral powers which would carry the impression of dictation or coercion in disparagement of belligerent rights.

Mr. Evarts doubtless remembered that many years had not elapsed since the United States Government had felt its very existence to depend on maintaining belligerent rights to their full extent, and he was not at first disposed to stultify himself by helping to abridge the rights for which we had so long and so strenuously contended. It does not appear that he took any step whatever to interpose between the combatants. Nevertheless, it is evident that he was not altogether easy in his isolation; he had in fact, through his neglect to notice the information given him by his ministers in the belligerent States, incurred a serious responsibility; although he had said not a word which showed a double motive, it is clear that he wished not only to respect belligerent rights himself, not only to forego interference on our part, but to keep England and Germany aloof. This was a position he could not long hold. If the United States would not act with England and Germany, the United States must act alone, or run great risk of forfeiting their influence, and also of unpleasant complications with foreign states. So at least Mr. Evarts seems to have thought, for when, in the following September, the British minister returned to the subject, and inquired whether it was true, as the newspapers alleged, that our Government had expressed its willingness to offer its good offices independently of European powers, Mr. Evarts replied:

> That our ministers have given and are giving attention to the wishes of this Government in favor of peace at the earliest indication of the readiness of the belligerents to consider such good offices acceptable.

This is all very well, and was meant to satisfy the British minister, but there is no evidence in the dispatches to show that Mr. Evarts was giving attention to the action of our ministers. The important point is, that our Government refused to co-operate with England and Germany, on the alleged ground that Mr. Evarts desired to do nothing "in disparagement of belligerent rights." It is, perhaps, unnecessary to raise the question whether the unasked mediation of the United States, even thus acting alone, was strictly in accordance with this desire, but from the moment Mr. Evarts decided to have recourse to mediation, after having declined the offer of England and Germany, he assumed for the United States to a certain extent the moral obligation to succeed in the undertaking thus imposed upon the country by him, and it was obvious that a failure in such circumstances must deeply injure the proper influence and position of the United States.

While, then, Mr. Evarts was thus answering the British minister in Washington, his envoy (Mr. Christiancy) at Lima was actually offering the good offices of the United States in behalf of peace, as it appears from the dispatches dated September 17th and 24th:

> In the mean time I have taken the liberty, in a confidential and informal manner, (which I deem much the best in the present stage of the case,) to inform the minister of foreign affairs that our Government is ready to tender its good offices to bring about peace whenever it shall be satisfied that such a course will be agreeable to all the belligerents.
> In a long and frank conversation yesterday with the minister of foreign affairs I again gave him the assurance (mentioned in my dispatch No. 59) that our Government was ready to tender its good offices to all the belligerents in behalf of peace whenever there should be good reason to believe that it would be acceptable to all the belligerents. I offered to make this tender formally, and officially, if he preferred; but, like me, he thought best to leave it in this informal shape for the present.

On the 13th of October Mr. Evarts approved Mr. Christiancy's course in a dispatch in which he expresses the distinct condition that it should be the "evident desire of all the parties to the struggle" that such a course should be adopted.

The fact is that neither of the belligerents now asked intervention, despite these overtures of our agents. By this time the positions of the United States and the belligerents, thanks to Mr. Evarts's neglect at the outset to notice the intimations of his ministers, had become completely reversed. Our ministers were now seeking in vain the opportunity which Mr. Evarts at the beginning might have accepted, but did not. Neither of the belligerents in October desired our intervention, and it might have been expected that self-respect would have induced the Secretary of State to desist from overtures which were not encouraged. But Mr. Evarts had exposed himself to a growing pressure from the neutral powers. He had assumed in dealing with them a responsibility which he could neither meet nor shake off. Nearly a year passed, and it became more and more evident that Peru was in great peril. On the 9th of May, 1880, we find Mr. Evarts in vain urging Mr. Osborn at Santiago to induce Chili to turn to the United States as an arbitrator. This was just about a year after the time at which Mr. Evarts had treated with absolute neglect Mr. Osborn's intimations that Chili would then have entertained such action by the United States Government. Mr. Christiancy, on the 12th of June, 1880, got to the point of renewing the offer of his services, this time directly to the "supreme chief of Peru," Pierola, who had established a dictatorship. The offer was made with very little reference to any reservation as to the "evident desire of all the parties," but instead of a favorable answer, which he was unable to obtain, Mr. Evarts's minister thought fit to send his own inferences, in the following terms:

He (the supreme chief) received my suggestions in the kindest manner, and, though he did not say so in so many words, I thought I could perceive by his manner that he would be glad to secure peace on any reasonable terms, and would feel grateful to our Government for any effort which might lead to such a result.

If we bear in mind the declaration of Mr. Evarts that the United States would not interfere by way of mediation, excepting in case this Government was requested to do so by the belligerents, it may appear strange that on the 29th of July, 1880, he addressed the following telegram to our ministers:

Press upon Chilian Government our desire to aid in restoring peace on honorable terms between nations to which we are sincerely and equally friendly. A like instruction is sent to-day to Lima.

PERU ENCOURAGED TO EXPECT OUR AID.

Step by step Mr. Evarts had drifted forward until he had altogether lost sight of his starting point. Under the force of circumstances and the supposed necessity of keeping up appearances in the eyes of neutral powers he had reached a position where Peru was encouraged to expect the aid of the United States Government.

If the policy of intervention was to be adopted at all, why was not a decision reached in April, 1879, at the beginning of the war? It might then have been more easy to restore peace on "honorable terms." But to seek for such a result in July, 1880, by a simple moral pressure, when the victories of Chili had been so marked, was to court a failure which the conference of Arica emphasized and made ridiculous.

Nevertheless, the policy being fairly adopted, it became necessary to know what means our Government had of intervening with effect. It was known what Chili would demand. Five months before this time, on the 5th of March, 1880, our minister in Chili, Mr. Osborn, had written that no one in Chili presumed to question the annexation of Tarapaca, and that "no proposition for peace, which should exclude such a settlement, would be seriously considered by the Chilian Government." Whether this was true of the Chilian people or not, may be open to question. But it was the only information our State Department had any right to act upon.

Notwithstanding this information, the only instructions which our diplomatic agents received were to the effect that they should "aid in restoring peace on honorable terms." Surely this seems somewhat vague, if intended to serve as a guide to men charged with the duty of mediators in so important a conference as that about to be opened at Arica. Our Government might either have told Peru that she must submit to the fortunes of war and lose Tarapaca, or else that she should have the support of the United States in refusing to do so. As a matter of fact neither course was followed, but on the strength of this vague dispatch of July 29, and after laborious negotiations, the belligerents were induced at least to listen to, if no longer to solicit, the mediation of the United States.

The conferences were opened on the United States ship Lackawanna on the 22d of October, 1880. After three sittings the conferences came to an end on the 27th. Chili made propositions which were declined by the allies. These, on their part, proposed the arbitration of the United States, which Chili rejected.

Our Government remained silent for some weeks, but on the 25th of December, Christmas day, Mr. Evarts began again. Two months had elapsed since the failure of his conferences at Arica. There is nothing on record to show that in the interval either victorious Chili or the vanquished allies or the despairing neutrals had solicited his good offices. But suddenly the silence of the State Department was broken, and the riotous republics of South America were solemnly called to order. This time Mr. Evarts distinctly intimated that the President of the United States would be willing to be made arbitrator. He caused this to be made officially known to the three belligerent governments in the following note to Mr. Osborn:

SIR: My attention has been called to the following passage of your remarks at the conference held at Arica, Peru, on the 25th of October last, as reported in the second protocol of those conferences:

"His excellency Mr. Osborn remarked that it seemed proper to him as well as to his colleagues to place upon record that the Government of the United States does not ask the position of arbiter in this question. A strict compliance with the duties inherent to that position would involve much trouble and great labor, and, while he could not doubt that this Government would accept the position if properly requested to do so, it was nevertheless proper that it be understood that its representatives did not court that distinction."

As it is not quite clear what the meaning and scope of your remarks on that occasion was, I will thank you for explanation on the subject. There was no impropriety in your making it clear to the representatives of the belligerent states that this Government had no desire to unduly urge its arbitration upon them. If, however, it was your purpose to convey the impression that we would not cheerfully assume any labor and trouble incident to arbitration in the interests of peace and the service of justice, you have not correctly appreciated the views and wishes of this Government. It is the sincere desire of the President to see an honorable and lasting peace secured among the South American republics now engaged in war, and he will shrink from no effort or responsibility which can properly tend to the accomplishment of such a desirable result.

In order to remove a possibly wrong impression which your language may have made upon the representatives of the belligerent powers, you will read this instruction to the minister for foreign affairs of Chili, and I will instruct Mr. Christiancy and Mr. Adams to read a copy of it to the ministers for foreign affairs of Peru and Bolivia, respectively.

In this dispatch, for the first time, we see our Government, thanks to Mr. Evarts and Mr. Osborn, assuming something very like a hostile attitude toward Chili, the so far victorious belligerent.

Mediation is one thing, arbitration another. A mediator is a friend, an arbitrator is a judge. A mediator can stop when he will, an arbitrator must assume the responsibility of arriving at a conclusion. Moreover, Chili, at Arica, had refused our arbitration. Had anything happened since the conference at Arica to make Mr. Evarts suppose she would accept it?

The Chilians marched on Lima. The situation had become more grave than ever, and Mr. Evarts could offer no acceptable suggestion, could impose no restraint.

On the 10th of February, 1881, still pressed by the neutral powers, Mr. Evarts again wrote to Mr. Osborn:

Urge upon Chili the desire of the United States to bring about peace. Now that the Chilians have captured Lima and Callao, it is believed that Peru will accept the mediation of the United States.

Naturally enough! In answer Mr. Osborn wrote to Mr. Evarts on the 8th of March following:

I cannot urge upon the Chilian authorities the mediation of the United States, because Chili has decided to accept no foreign mediation.

Perhaps Mr. Evarts's appeal, almost pathetic, after all that had happened, would have been ineffective, yet it is still a question to be decided between him and Mr. Osborn whether these instructions so given ought not to have been obeyed with alacrity.

ADVENT OF THE FRENCH COMPANY.

The State Department was evidently at a loss what to do. Then it was that the French Société Generale du Credit Industriel et Commercial was brought to the notice of Mr. Evarts. On the 20th of January, 1881, the plan was laid before the State Department. This plan required immense resources, but it was not resources which were in question. It was the active intervention of our Government, without which nothing could be done, and in the face of the refusal of Chili at that moment to accept our intervention it is difficult to understand the official recommendation which was given by Mr. Evarts to the propositions of this company. The Credit Industriel offered to assume for a term of years the Peruvian debt of two hundred and fifty millions; to assume a war indemnity of twenty millions, and to pay an annuity sufficient to meet all the national obligations both of Chili and Peru; and in return it required that Chili should surrender to Peru the conquered territory, subject to a protectorate of the United States guaranteeing to the Credit Industriel the free and unobstructed shipment of guano and the nitrates for the same term of years. The proposition was equivalent to erecting this French company into a mediating power between Chili and Peru. It involved a protectorate and guarantee by the United States of Peru, as regards Chili, should Peru ask it.

The agent of the company was informed that the United States could not use compulsion to enforce its decision; yet that the instructions to our ministers at Lima, Santiago, and La Paz would be renewed, and that they would be directed to proceed most earnestly to convince the belligerents of the necessity of terminating the fratricidal war; that the plan of the Credit Industriel would be commended to their consideration; that this plan was regarded as a means which might aid considerably in settling financial difficulties; and that though they would not seek the position of international trustee, as was proposed by the company, yet the United States would willingly accept it if the belligerents should agree on that point.

The Secretary of State entered so fully into the plans of the company that he thought it important for it to have some American status to bring it more directly within the range of American interests. To this suggestion, made by our own State Department, we owe the subsequent tender of an American agency made by this company to the American house of Morton, Bliss & Co.

One point, and one point only, needed to be settled with perfect clearness, and this was whether Chili should or should not be allowed to annex the nitrate district of Tarapaca. Upon the decision of the United States in this respect all other plans depended, and until the United States decided this point the unfortunate South Americans must continue to destroy each other from sheer inability to agree.

Peru would not submit so long as Mr. Evarts and the Credit Industriel were trying to save her from dismemberment, nor would Chili, on the other hand, surrender Tarapaca. Peru was encouraged and Chili was not discouraged.

On the 17th of February, 1881, Mr. Evarts had sent the "programme" of the Credit Industriel to Mr. Christiancy, adding, "that as the plan might be calculated to assist in the restoration of peace, it is proper that it should be laid before the representatives of the United States in Peru and Chili, that it might form an element in the calculations of the belligerents in settling the terms of peace; that the agents of the company come under respectable introductions, and the financial bodies and persons whom they represent are well known and of much weight in financial circles."

Mr. Evarts admits in the same dispatch that this plan might place the United States under actual obligations, by saying:

Any further responsibility of the Government can only be determined by actual negotiations between the belligerents, asking the United States Government to assume them.

The country has never learned the extent of the responsibility, financial or political, Mr. Evarts so lightly accepted in advance.

One of the agents of the company went to Lima with his "programme" and the "moral support of the United States," imparting some mysterious sanction to his acts in the eyes of Peru. Thus ended this diplomatic campaign, which certainly did not benefit our position or that of any one concerned. It did not give South America peace or the State Department any visible honor.

THE NEW SECRETARY.

When the new Secretary of State took up the threads of our foreign relations one year ago he found the South American affair in the condition I have described. His first act had a martial appearance. He removed Mr. Osborn to send General Kilpatrick to Santiago; and he removed Mr. Christiancy in order to substitute General Hurlbut at Lima. In the meantime the Government of Peru had gone to pieces. On the 5th of May the Department received from Mr. Christiancy a dispatch announcing that the people of Peru were divided into two bodies, one of which recognized the military dictator Pierola as its head, while the other was trying to set up a provisional government under Mr. Calderon.

Each Government—

Said Mr. Christiancy—

from time to time contrives to get statements of acts of adhesion signed by many citizens, and these often come from the same locality, the population being divided. But, upon the whole, the evidence as yet is quite clear that the overwhelming majority of the people of Peru are opposed to the provisional government.

I know not what there was in this statement which decided the Secretary's action, but it is certainly a fact that on May 9, four days after hearing from Mr. Christiancy that the overwhelming majority of the Peruvians were opposed to Calderon's government, he paid Mr. Christiancy the compliment of recognizing the Calderon government.

RECOGNITION OF CALDERON.

This abrupt disregard of the opinion contained in the dispatch of our minister to Peru was probably due to the long note of Señor Elmore, at that time the confidential agent at Washington of the Calderon government, dated May 4, containing an earnest plea for the recognition of Calderon as a provisional government.

The first and most important act of Señor Garcia Calderon's government—will be to conclude a treaty of peace with Chili, thus securing to Peru its sovereignty as an independent nation. Now, it is especially for this high and noble purpose that Peru appeals to the United States of America, and it is most particularly to this end that the provisional government of Peru (Calderon) has appointed the undersigned as his organ of communication with your excellency's government.

It is evident that without this recognition Calderon was powerless. The recognition was, no doubt, of great assistance to Calderon, but it carried with it grave responsibilities for our Government. Was the subject in all its proportions and its probable consequences laid before the Cabinet? However that may be, the two new ministers set out for their posts, and on the 15th of June the Secretary of State gave them their instructions. To prevent Chili from annexing the nitrate district was the objective point of the new administration as it was of the old. This is the more evident as Mr. Blaine, having before him Mr. Evarts's instructions to ministers in Peru and Chili, and his recommendations of the French company's plans, left them in force, and entered immediately into relations with the agents of the Credit Industriel. One of the agents of that company (Suarez) had returned from Peru and advised the Secretary of all negotiations to which he had been a party. The Secretary of State was now acting in concert with the plans of the Credit Industriel, and with Mr. Elmore, the Peruvian envoy, then representing the Calderon government, upon which these plans depended. The instructions to General Hurlbut of June 15 embraced all these parties.

A comparison of the instructions given to General Hurlbut with those given to General Kilpatrick plainly shows that General Kilpatrick was expected and directed to co-operate with General Hurlbut in bringing about the establishment in Peru of the Calderon government, and the adjustment of a peace which should not involve the cession of Tarapaca by Peru to Chili. To rescue the province of Tarapaca from the grasp of Chili was the purpose for which General Hurlbut toiled, and to accomplish which he was instructed to recognize and uphold the Calderon government. Calderon, as provisional president, had completely adopted the plan of the Credit Industriel under its continuing contracts with the Peruvian Government, and Mr. Elmore's instructions were to endeavor to have the plan adopted here in Washington.

General Kilpatrick was instructed by the Department of State, under date of June 15, 1881—

First. That it is evident from the protocols of the conference at Arica that Chili was prepared to dictate and not discuss terms of peace, and that the arbitration of the United States upon any questions of difference with Peru and Bolivia was not acceptable and would not be acceptable to Chili.

Second. That therefore this Government cannot anticipate that the offer of intervention would be agreeable to Chili.

Third. That it would scarcely comport with self-respect that such an offer should be refused.

Fourth. That nevertheless Chili should also know that if at any time the interposition of the good offices of this Government can contribute to the restoration of peace, they will on proper intimation be promptly offered.

Fifth. That Mr. Kilpatrick must not give advice officially which is not sought.

Sixth. That this Government does not wish to discuss the security for the future which Chili's interest may seem to require.

Seventh. That if Chili seek only a guarantee of future peace, Peru and Bolivia should be allowed to offer such indemnity and guarantee before the annexation of territory is insisted upon.

Eighth. That if those powers fail to offer what is a reasonably sufficient indemnity and guarantee, that it becomes a fair subject of consideration whether such territory may not be exacted as the price of peace.

Ninth. That at the conclusion of a war avowedly not of conquest, to make the acquisition of territory a sine qua non of peace is calculated to cast suspicion on the professions with which war was declared.

Tenth. That the forced transfer of territory is not a case in which a power desiring the territory can be accepted as a safe and impartial judge.

Eleventh. That the United States Government does not pretend to express an opinion whether or not such an annexation of territory is a necessary consequence of this war, and it believes that it would be better that such territorial changes should be avoided as far as possible.

Twelfth. That they should never be the result of mere force, but should be decided and tempered by discussion.

Thirteenth. That at present such a discussion is impossible.

Fourteenth. That for a provisional government to succeed in obtaining the confidence either of its own people or of foreign powers it must be allowed a freedom and force of action which cannot be exercised while Chili holds absolute possession and governs by military authority.

Fifteenth. That the Department of State would be gratified if Chili is induced to postpone settlement of all questions of territorial acquisition to diplomatic negotiations.

Sixteenth. That the United States hope that the peace negotiations shall be conducted and the final settlement determined without either side invoking the aid or intervention of any European power, and that this Government will regret to be compelled to consider how far that feeling might be affected and a more active interposition forced upon it by any attempted complication of this question with European politics.

The same day the Secretary instructed General Hurlbut:

It is to be hoped that you will be able, in your necessary association with the Chilian authorities, to impress upon them that the more liberal and considerate their policy, the surer it will be to obtain a lasting and satisfactory settlement. The Peruvians are certainly aware of the sympathy and interest of the people of the United States, and will, I feel confident, be prepared to give to your representations the consideration to which the friendly anxiety of this Government entitles them. The United States cannot refuse to recognize the rights which the Chilian Government has acquired by the successes of the war, and it may be that a cession of territory will be the necessary price to be paid for peace. It would seem to declare that under no circumstances could the loss of territory be accepted as the result of negotiation. The great objects of the provisional authorities of Peru would seem to be to secure the establishment of a constitutional government, and next to succeed in the opening of negotiations for peace without the declarations of preliminary condition as an ultimatum on either side. It will be difficult, perhaps, to obtain this from Chili, but as the Chilian Government has distinctly repudiated the idea that this was a war of conquest, the Government of Peru may fairly claim the opportunity to make propositions of indemnity and guarantee before submitting to a cession of territory. As far as the influence of the United States will go in Chili, it will be exerted to consent that the question of the cession of territory should be the subject of negotiation, and not the condition precedent upon which alone negotiation shall commence. If you can aid the Government of Peru in securing such a result you will have rendered the service which seems most pressing. Whether it is in the power of the Peruvian Government to make any arrangements at home or abroad, singly or with assistance of friendly powers, which will furnish the necessary indemnity or supply the required guarantee, you will be better able to advise me after you have reached your post. As you are aware, more than one proposition has been submitted to the consideration of this Government looking to a friendly intervention by which Peru might be enabled to meet the conditions which would probably be imposed. Circumstances do not seem at present opportune for such action, but if, upon full knowledge of you can inform this Government that Peru can devise and carry into practical effect a plan by which all the reasonable conditions of Chili can be met without sacrificing the integrity of the Peruvian territory, the Government of the United States would be willing to tender its good offices toward the execution of such a project.

TO INDUCE THE CHILIAN GOVERNMENT

These two documents, taken together, prove that the Secretary of State recognized in theory Chili's right by conquest to annexation, but that he was searching for means of avoiding it in practice. This position may partly be understood from the relations which the Secretary thought fit to establish with the representatives in this country of the contending states. While the Peruvian envoy, Mr. Elmore, was encouraged, as he himself says, to believe that the United States Government meant actively to intervene in behalf of the territorial integrity of Peru, the Chilian envoy, Mr. Martinez, was assured, as he himself says, on more than one occasion, that the United States Government regarded the annexation of Tarapaca by Chili as a legitimate result of the war. There can be no doubt that it was expected and intended eventually to accomplish whatever objects might have been involved, through a pressure to be put by the United States Government upon Chili whenever the negotiations for peace took a practical form.

It is impossible not to be struck by the contradictory character of the dispatches except so far as they refer to an indemnity to be furnished by the Credit Industriel. While they concede that the United States cannot refuse to recognize the rights which the Chilian Government have acquired by conquest, and admit that the annexation may be the necessary price to be paid for peace, at the same time the cause of Peru is openly advocated, Chili is taxed with bad faith, a suspicion of the motives actuating that government is expressed, and finally a more active interposition threatened. The mission of General Kilpatrick to Chili was intended to be subordinated to the mission of General Hurlbut to Peru, and for the success of the mission of General Hurlbut the Secretary relied upon the financial intervention of the Credit Industriel in the affairs of Peru. If Chili would accept the intervention amiably, so much the better. If she would not so accept it she was to be exposed to the danger of putting herself in an attitude not only of unfriendliness but of provocation toward the United States, the central point aimed at in the whole policy, as outlined to the ministers at Lima and Santiago, being the retention by Peru of the territory of Tarapaca. This was essential to enable the Peruvian Government, in the Secretary's words, to make any arrangements at home or abroad, singly or with the assistance of friendly powers, which will furnish the necessary indemnity, or supply the required guarantee, to Chili.

THE POSITION OF KILPATRICK.

The relations established between the minister at Lima and the minister at Santiago by the State Department cannot be fully understood or appreciated without considering for a moment the relations of both these ministers to the Secretary himself. General Hurlbut was a personal friend and a close political ally. General Kilpatrick had no such relations. He had previously served as United States minister to Chili under President Grant. From the beginning the Secretary took pains to make it clear that he relied mainly upon the legation at Lima and not upon the legation at Santiago to bring about the success of his programme in South America. The whole of the programme, therefore, was not confided to General Kilpatrick. This appears from the dispatches to both ministers.

As to the recognition of Calderon, Mr. Christiancy had written on the 21st and 28th of June, first, that the Calderon government is not a government de facto; secondly, that the Calderon government is not yet worthy of recognition; and even on the 9th of July, after the recognition of Calderon, he wrote that this act was premature, and that he justified his own formal act of recognition only on the ground that it was in obedience to State Department orders. Mr. Suarez, the agent of the Credit Industriel, after full conferences with the Secretary, accompanied General Hurlbut to Peru, and, about the same time, on the 9th of July, Mr. Elmore, the agent of the Calderon government went to Paris with Mr. R. E. Randall, the counsel of the company.

The conduct of General Hurlbut during the next four months has been severely criticised. It must be said, however, that he at least stated his opinions openly, and acted upon them without hesitation. In his earliest dispatch, dated August 10, 1881, he laid down the rules which were to guide him, and these rules were precisely such as were required by the principles on which the Department had acted.

It is in my deliberate and carefully considered judgment—

Said he—

the proper time for the United States to act as a friend to both parties, and to say very kindly but very firmly to Chili, that war has fulfilled all its legitimate purposes; that longer continuance of the state of war would be disastrous to both countries, and an unnecessary invasion of the rights of neutrals engaged in commerce, or owning as they do large properties in Peru; and that a peace, honorable to both countries, should be concluded as soon as possible on fair terms as to indemnity. Inasmuch as Peru offers to pay and can pay a money indemnity, the forcible annexation of territory ought not to be permitted. By such action on the part of our Government we would gain the highest influence in South America; we should subserve the purposes of a truer civilization and inaugurate a higher style of national and international law on this continent.

There can be no doubt that General Hurlbut understood what his Government wanted, especially since his view fully accords with the subsequent expressions and the previous acts of the Secretary of State. He went on to ask for an explicit approbation by telegraph, because circumstances would probably oblige him to act very speedily, and he warned the Secretary that if the emergency should arise before he heard from the Department he would not hesitate to interpose a protest against the demands of Chili. Before this dispatch had reached the Department the expected emergency arose, at least in General Hurlbut's opinion

On the 24th of August Admiral Lynch, the Chilian commander, called upon General Hurlbut and requested an explanation in regard to rumors afloat as to the attitude of the United States, and General Hurlbut not only told him with the utmost frankness what his own views were but he stated them as the views of the United States Government, and that there might be no doubt as to this he embodied them in a formal memorandum which he sent to Admiral Lynch next day, and which Admiral Lynch caused to be published.

It is perfectly clear that General Hurlbut's theory of intervention depended on the co-operation of the Credit Industriel. He looked upon Peru and the Credit Industriel as allied, and his instructions authorized him in doing so. Mr. Elmore, the Peruvian minister, has made no secret of this alliance, and of the fact that the State Department, as well as the Chilian Government, was aware of it.

It does not appear that Peru could, through any other financial combination, find the capital necessary to pay an indemnity of $40,000,000, upon which its territorial integrity then depended.

The machinery which was to liberate Peru was the same which had been approved by Mr. Evarts.

General Hurlbut's dispatch, containing a copy of this memorandum to Admiral Lynch, was received at the Department on September 27, 1881. It lay there unacknowledged and unanswered for nearly two months. As a matter of fact General Hurlbut's action was not disavowed, and he evidently believed it was approved.

When the news reached Washington of a disagreement between General Hurlbut and General Kilpatrick the Secretary of State, in writing to the former on the 22d of November, 1881, made some curious remarks about the "construction" put upon his language and conduct. He said:

I must consider the interpretation of your words and acts as the result of some strange and perhaps prejudicial misconception. I would have preferred that you should hold no communication with Admiral Lynch on questions of a diplomatic character.

Now, this is not in accord with the instructions to General Hurlbut of June 15, 1881, in which such diplomatic communications were expressly authorized, nor had this authorization been in any manner revoked. On the contrary, in those instructions the Secretary says:

It is to be hoped that you will be able in your necessary association with the Chilian authorities [Admiral Lynch was the supreme Chilian authority in Lima] to impress upon them that the more liberal and considerate their policy the surer it will be to obtain a lasting and satisfactory settlement.

It should also be remembered that Mr. Christiancy had already exchanged diplomatic communications with the Chilian authorities, and General Hurlbut simply followed this precedent. In the same dispatch of November 22 to General Hurlbut criticism is also made upon Admiral Lynch:

I do not conceive that he had any right to ask or receive any assurances as to the opinion of your government.

If the Secretary had authorized General Hurlbut to give the opinions of his Government to Chilian authorities, Admiral Lynch had at least the right to receive them. He makes a further criticism on the Chilian Government for having questioned General Kilpatrick as to what General Hurlbut had done, and then he adds:

Having said this, I must add that the language of the [Lynch] memorandum was capable of not unnatural misconstruction. While you said nothing that may not fairly be considered warranted by your instructions, you omitted to say with equal emphasis some things which your instructions supplied and which would perhaps have relieved the sensitive apprehensions of the Chilian authorities. For while the United States would unquestionably "regard with disfavor" the imperious annexation of Peruvian territory as the right of conquest, you were distinctly informed that this Government could not refuse to recognize that such annexation might become a necessary condition as a final treaty of peace. As the main purpose of your effort was expected to be not so much a protest against any possible annexation as an attempt by friendly or unofficial communications with the Chilian authorities (with whom you were duly associated) to induce them to support the policy of giving to Peru, without the imposition of harsh and absolute conditions precedent, the opportunity to show that the rights and interests of Chili could be satisfied without such annexation. There is enough in your memorandum, if carefully considered, to indicate this purpose, and I only regret that you did not state it with a distinctness and, if necessary, with a repetition which would have made impossible anything but the most willful misconception.

So far as General Hurlbut is concerned, the Secretary criticises the form and approves the substance of his memorandum to Admiral Lynch. This is the more remarkable in view of the official note addressed previously to our Government by Mr. Martinez, then Chilian minister in Washington, on the 27th of October, 1881, in which the unfriendly attitude of General Hurlbut toward Chili is commented on, and in which was inclosed a note from the Chilian Government instructing its minister to ascertain if the views of the United States Government were in accord with those of General Hurlbut.

BAY OF CHIMBOTE.

In regard to the convention relating to the Bay of Chimbote, the proposition of its cession to the United States was declined by the Secretary, though he stated that "it is a desirable arrangement." On the 20th of September, 1881, at the moment we were insisting that Chili should not annex Peruvian territory, this convention was concluded with the Calderon government, which granted to us a Peruvian port. This was not disavowed by telegraph and without reservation, as it might have been, but the Secretary waited until November 22, to write by mail that we reserved to ourselves the right of taking advantage eventually of this "innocent convenience."

The fact that the Peruvians knew or believed that we intended to ask this concession from them may be considered as justifying them in counting on our support and assistance. At the same time General Hurlbut accepted from President Calderon the grant of the Chimbote Railroad, on which Peru had already spent $9,000,000, and which General Hurlbut received as trustee, meaning to transfer it to some American company, to be finished at a cost of $10,000,000 more. These acts, whatever we may say as to their propriety, implied, and were of course intended to proclaim, that Peru and the Calderon government were under the protection of the United States. A few days later Admiral Lynch responded by suppressing the Calderon government. Calderon then convened congress in order to choose a vice-president to carry on the government in case the Chilians should seize him, and accordingly Admiral Montero was elected, mainly because he was then outside the Chilian military lines. The documents and papers of the Calderon government were taken to the United States legation.

Every Peruvian was then convinced that the United States were responsible for the integrity of Calderon's government, and every Chilian must have known that it was not Calderon but the United States minister who stood in their path, and that if the minister was acting under instructions, any further attack upon Calderon must produce a rupture of diplomatic relations. The United States then stood on the brink of war.

THE PERUVIAN COMPANY.

Leaving General Hurlbut for a time in this dramatic situation, let us go back for a moment to see by what steps he had reached it. On the 15th of June Mr. Blaine had instructed General Hurlbut:

Whether it is in the power of the Peruvian Government to make any arrangements at home or abroad, singly or with the assistance of friendly powers, which will furnish the necessary indemnity or supply the required guarantee, you will be better able to advise me after you have reached your post. As you are aware, more than one proposition has been submitted to the consideration of this Government looking to a friendly intervention by which Peru might be enabled to meet the conditions which would probably be imposed.

It is perfectly clear from this dispatch that important verbal instructions had been given to General Hurlbut. What were these instructions?

The unfortunate death of General Hurlbut, at the moment when he was preparing to leave his post in order to lay before Congress and the country the history of this extraordinary episode in our diplomatic annals, has deprived us of the only direct and trustworthy testimony as to this point upon which we could have relied. But it was testified before the committee that General Hurlbut, in a private letter, commenting, not without bitterness, upon the Secretary's dispatch of November 22, said:

My conversations with President Garfield and Mr. Blaine cannot appear, but they were the real motive of my course.

In these "conversations" the question of the ability of Peru, either "singly or with the assistance of friendly powers," to supply an indemnity or guarantee must, of course, have been fully considered. In the instructions of June 15, General Hurlbut is expressly reminded of this, and Mr. Trescot, who no doubt drafted these instructions, has testified that the Credit Industriel was the agency then intended. "As you are aware that more than one proposition has been submitted to the consideration of this Government looking to a friendly intervention by which Peru might be enabled to meet the conditions which would probably be imposed."

"More than one proposition?" What proposition had been submitted? A proposition called the Cabrera proposition was submitted by the representative of Bolivia. The terms of this proposition were published in the Mercurio newspaper at Valparaiso by the Chilian Government, and an English statement of the proposition was made public at Washington, February 18, 1881. It involved the "formation of a company in the United States of captalists to work and manage the guano and nitrate deposits of Peru and Bolivia," under a "guarantee" to be given by the United States Government to the company of "the undisturbed possession and control of the guano and nitrate business in the territories now claimed and occupied by Chili."

Another proposition has been already alluded to and described as made by the Credit Industriel of Paris. Mr. Elmore, the Peruvian minister, says of this proposition in a letter to the press:

Valid and solemn contracts exist between the Government of Peru and a most honorable and powerful financial society of Paris called the Société de Credit Industriel et Commercial. Among these contracts are those of January 7, 1880, and February 1, 1881, which are intended to secure the payment of the foreign creditors of Peru, and other national debts, by placing in the hands of the Credit Industriel the management and working of the Peruvian guano and nitrate deposits. Now, in consequence of these legal national contracts, negotiations between the said Credit Industriel and Peru were begun more than a year ago, (of which Secretary Evarts and Secretary Blaine as well as the Chilian Government were advised,) with the object of affording Peru means of satisfying the rightful claims of Chili in respect to a war indemnity, without sacrificing the integrity of Peruvian territory.

A third proposition was that of Mr. Shipherd, submitted in behalf of his then inchoate Peruvian Company, in a series of communications to the Executive during April and May, 1881. Of this proposition, though it occupied the time and the attention of the State Department, to the exclusion of much practical business and to the great scandal of the Government and its officers, it is difficult to speak seriously.

It was based on two alleged claims against Peru, vast and indefinite in amount, originating with citizens of France, and bought in part or in whole by American citizens as a matter of speculation. It invited the United States Government to perform a grand financial operation. The Secretary of State was asked to give Peru to understand that if Peru would recognize these claims in whole or in part a colossal and speculative company would be founded in the United States upon that recognition, and, being so founded, would take all the guano and nitrate territories of Peru under the protection of the United States, and administer the same, paying to Chili the ransom of those territories, defraying the public expenses of Peru, and dividing the rest of the revenues derivable from the guanos and the nitrates among Mr. Shipherd and his associates.

The United States Government apparently was to be content with the obstetrical honors of this truly brilliant and remarkable operation. As we have seen, Mr. Shipherd had made approaches to the Executive in April and May. Mr. Shipherd and Senator BLAIR made their first joint appearance in the story only at the end of July, 1881. Up to the moment they came upon the scene, our diplomacy, as to South America, is comparatively intelligible. The Department had received the propositions of the Credit Industriel as the only serious financial propositions available for the purpose of effecting a peace between Chili and the allies on the basis of an indemnity under the auspices of the United States Government. Instructions had been given to our ministers, based on these propositions, which so far as they relate to them may pass as consistent enough.

But from the moment Shipherd and Senator BLAIR appear, all logic and consistency vanish. These persons represented a claim against Peru of Alexander Cochet, a French citizen, who said he had discovered the commercial value of the guano deposits in Peru, and therefore, according to Peruvian law, was entitled to one-third of the value of the guano, in round numbers, $900,000,000. A French and Spanish commission had decided against the claim in 1861, and the claimant died in Paris in the year 1864 in an almshouse. The French Government had declined to support his claim, which had finally fallen into the hands of Mr. Shipherd, and was estimated by that gentleman as amounting, "within safe limits," including principal and interest, to $880,000,000, the right to which Shipherd appears to have bought for the consideration of $1 in currency from a certain Dr. Stewart in Philadelphia.

Together with this claim, which constituted all the available capital of Mr. Shipherd's Peruvian company, Mr. Blaine brings into the business by a dispatch to General Hurlbut, dated August 4, 1881, another claim, alleged to be derived from Mr. J. T. Landreau, also a French citizen, who, in the year 1856, seems to have informed the Peruvian Government that he had discovered some guano deposits, and who, in the year 1865, obtained from the Peruvian Government a decree on the subject of his claim, the third article of which bound him and his representatives never to agitate any question growing out of the concession except in the Peruvian tribunals, and to renounce expressly all diplomatic intervention under penalty of the absolute forfeiture of his whole claim. On this basis a contract was made. In 1868, however, the Peruvian Government annulled its contract. The French Government investigated that affair, but thus far has not interfered, although it is said that even now Mr. J. T. Landreau is in Paris trying to interest his government in the matter.

A part of this claim, it is alleged, belonged to J. C. Landreau, a brother of J. T. Landreau, who claims to have been a partner in the affair. As this person is represented as a minor, under eighteen years of age, in 1857, some years after the alleged discoveries were made, his partnership in law may be questioned. Not until ten years afterward, on June 3, 1867, did he become, as he alleges, a citizen of the United States, at New Orleans, although a search in that city has thus far failed to bring to light the record of his naturalization.

In 1871, however, J. C. Landreau wrote to the State Department complaining of the Peruvian Government for not fulfilling the contract which it had made with him. After repeated rebuffs from Mr. Fish, he at length got a favorable report from Mr. O'Connor, the examiner of claims in the State Department. On the strength of this report, Mr. Fish, in 1874, called the attention of Mr. Thomas, then United States minister in Peru, to Landreau's claim, expressly stating, however, to Mr. Thomas that he must move in the matter, if at all, "unofficially."

The Peruvian foreign office took express notice of this reservation, and nothing was done by Peru to advance Landreau's claim. At the close of the second administration of President Grant, in February, 1877, Mr. J. C. Landreau was appointed United States consul at Santiago de Cuba, which office he still holds; and this House, on the 20th of February, 1880, adopted a resolution requesting the President to "take such steps as in his opinion may be proper and in accordance with international law to secure to the said John C. Landreau a final settlement and adjustment of his claim." This resolution was sent to the Senate and has slept in committee ever since. It never reached the President at all.

In the first interviews with Mr. Blaine at the end of July Mr. Shipherd and Senator BLAIR seem to have suggested the probability of some arrangement under which the Cochet and Landreau claims might be thrown together as the basis of a vast "Peruvian company," representing a capital "within safe limits" of some $1,200,000,000. In fact it has been proved that Shipherd had the audacity to send General Hurlbut, the new minister to Peru, before he left for that country, a memorandum offering to reserve, "say, $250,000 of the pool stock" of this prospective company subject to the minister's "advice."

Within a week after his first interviews with Shipherd and Senator BLAIR, the Secretary of State sent to the minister at Lima a dispatch, dated August 4, 1881, (the only dispatch sent for months to that minister,) in which, after a brief allusion to the Cochet claim, the merits of the Landreau claim are assumed and urged, and the minister is thus explicitly instructed:

You will take especial care to notify both the Chilian and Peruvian authorities of the character and status of the claim in order that no definitive treaty of peace shall be made in disregard of the rights which Landreau may be found to possess.

Mr. Shipherd's conduct has been explained on the theory that he is not morally responsible; that he labored under an "indefinable hallucination." Lunatic he may be, but if so he was a lunatic introduced, supported, and advised by persons of such influence and position and in such a manner that he met with nothing at first but cordiality and confidence, whatever may be said about his subsequent treatment.

To take up Mr. Shipherd and his Peruvian company was to throw over the Credit Industriel, on whose capital and connections the scheme for rescuing Peru had up to that time rested, and which, as Mr. Trescot testified, was "unquestionably" the only one referred to in the instructions of the State Department of June 15, 1881. Nothing yet made public on this subject adequately explains this sudden and violent change of policy which in a few hours altered the whole scheme of action and threw all parties connected with the affair into a state of embarrassment and confusion from which they never again escaped.

On the 19th of November the Secretary wrote to General Hurlbut that "agents of the Credit Industriel had visited the Department of State and ineffectually endeavored to enlist the interest of this Government in their behalf. However trustworthy the Credit Industriel may be, I did not consider it proper for the Department to have anything whatever to do with it. It is a foreign corporation, responsible to French law, and must seek its patronage and protection from France." This is inconsistent with the facts in regard to the past relations of the Credit Industriel with the State Department, but it proves Mr. Shipherd's assertion that the Credit Industriel was thrown over.

This is the more inexplicable because this company was in the closest connection with the Calderon government, and was the only agency which our Government had hitherto endeavored to employ to carry out its fixed idea of ransoming Tarapaca. To say that any real friend of Peru would, at such a time, have thrown Mr. Shipherd and his vicious schemes in the path of a settlement, even were it that proposed by the Credit Industriel, is absurd.

The truth is, that this unaccountable dispatch of August 4 produced the wildest confusion among the subordinates of the Department. It led to their massacre in detail in every direction. The first and most conspicuous victim was an unexpected one—no less a person than our minister in Paris. The firm of Morton, Bliss & Co., of which he is a member, entered into an agency for the sale of nitrates in the United States by a contract with the Credit Industriel, and it was agreed that the continuation of this agency should depend on the success of the United States Government in carrying out the programme of the Credit Industriel. I will say nothing of the propriety of the contract, but I will say that, in my belief, if this transaction was known to our minister, he must have supposed that he was rendering essential service to the Government. This contract was dated August 27, just one month after Mr. Shipherd had taken possession of the State Department. It is clear that our minister at Paris had received no warning of that event; he still may have supposed the Credit Industriel to be the essential agency—the central pivot of our South American policy.

Our minister in Paris and his commercial house were, however, only the victims of this sudden and violent change of policy, but our minister in Peru was in a worse case; he was almost a martyr. The dispatch of the Secretary of State of August 4 reached General Hurlbut in the middle of September and disturbed him very much, as his reply shows, (page 552 of the correspondence,) but he promised to obey orders. Then came a shower of letters from Shipherd announcing that the State Department at Washington had been put under Mr. Shipherd's control, and that the fate of Chili and Peru depended on a settlement of the Cochet and Landreau claims. Rumors began to circulate that General Hurlbut, after all, represented nothing but a speculative enterprise. These suspicions were fatal to his moral influence; they undermined his position. The Chilians clamored about these claims, in which they charged that Calderon and Hurlbut were partners. Had the country been at peace these suspicions would have been hard enough to bear, but the country was terribly racked by war, and General Hurlbut, single-handed, had undertaken to establish a government, put down internal faction, and eject 30,000 Chilians. Against such odds, to load the American minister with Mr. Shipherd and the Peruvian company was the crowning stroke of this so-called vigorous diplomacy!

The Chilians at last, on November 2, seized upon Señor Calderon and sent him to Chili.

MR. BLAINE REPUDIATES GENERAL HURLBUT.

Meanwhile the Secretary, on the 27th of October, had sent a curious telegram to General Hurlbut. Mark that although the Lynch memorandum and the Garcia letter had long since been received at the Department, neither then nor for six weeks thereafter was there expressed the smallest disapproval of those documents, which had no other object than to carry out the policy of aiding Peru by saving Tarapaca, thus enabling the Credit Industriel to pay the Chilian indemnity. This telegram of October 27 was on another subject; it ran thus: "Influence of your position must not be used in aiding the Credit Industriel, or any other financial or speculative association."

Whatever else this meant, it at least meant that the Secretary had found out his mistake in patronizing Shipherd, and was trying to get rid of him. If we turn to the explanatory letter of November 19, we find the Credit Industriel and the Peruvian company for the first time yoked together in order to cover them both in the same gentle oblivion for a time!

Finally, if we turn to the Secretary's letter of November 17, in which there is no reference whatever to the Credit Industriel, it is only too clear that the Secretary's mind was greatly harassed by the conduct of Mr. Jacob R. Shipherd. In fact, between August 4 and November 22, 1881, except for a brief order to continue the recognition of Calderon's government after it had been suppressed, Shipherd and the Landreau claim were the burden of Mr. Blaine's instructions. On the 22d of November he wrote to General Hurlbut disapproving for the first time and in a very qualified manner all his acts—the Lynch memorandum, the Garcia letter, the Chimbote cession. On the 3d of December the disapproval was made more emphatic. It is noticeable that this dispatch to General Hurlbut was written on the same day that the Secretary also sent a letter to Shipherd, by which the latter was at last discarded by the Department of State, and in which it is stated that only Shipherd's apparent mental irresponsibility saved him from prosecution. Finally he announced that the President would send a special mission to cover General Hurlbut's withdrawal.

The instructions to Mr. Trescot, the special commissioner, required a disavowal by Chili of the "impression" that Calderon's arrest was due to his continued recognition by the United States; they forbade any disavowal of General Hurlbut, in spite of the Secretary's pretended disapproval of that minister, and on the crucial point, the cession of Tarapaca, they used the following language:

This Government holds that between two independent nations hostilities do not, from the mere existence of war, confer the right of conquest until the failure to furnish the indemnity and guarantee which can be rightfully demanded. The annexation of Tarapaca, which under proper administration would produce annually a sum sufficient to pay large indemnity, seems to us to be not consistent with the execution of justice.

Thus it appears, then, that after six months of confusion, after reciprocal insults, after the buffoonery of Shipherd, we come back to the exact point we started from: should Chili have Tarapaca? Throughout the whole period neither Peru nor Chili had asked for our mediation or intervention in any form, but on the other hand the Credit Industriel did ask that Tarapaca be retained, so that the contracts with Peru might be carried out; and so, also, did the Landreau claimants ask to be secured in their pretended rights over the same territory—whether that territory was to go to Chili or remain in the possession of Peru.

On the 22d of November the Secretary formally tells General Hurlbut that he is all wrong in saying that the President would not consent to the cession of Tarapaca, and one week later, on December 1, he still more formally tells Mr. Trescot that the President does not consent to it. All these dispatches bear the marks only of the struggles between the rival interests of the Credit Industriel and the Landreau claimants. The Landreau claim survived the last word of the Secretary on the 16th of December, being an intervention in behalf of that claim.

With the mission of Mr. Trescot Mr. Blaine's official share in these transactions draws near to its close. That mission was of his devising. Mr. Trescot, under Mr. Blaine's direction, drew up the instructions of June 15, 1881, given to General Hurlbut and General Kilpatrick. Mr. Trescot, still under Mr. Blaine's direction, drew up that fatal dispatch of August 4, 1881, to General Hurlbut, in which the United States Government formally extended its shield over the Landreau claim, and thrust upon Chili and Peru the necessity of recognizing that claim as a condition precedent to any negotiation of peace on the west coast.

What was the object in sending Mr. Trescot to South America? In the answer to this question surely we ought to find, if we are to find it anywhere, a thread of purpose throughout this deplorable story.

From the instructions given to Mr. Trescot by Mr. Blaine on the 1st of December, 1881, it appears that the special commissioners sent to South America were instructed to insist on two points mainly. One of these was to exact from Chili, on pain of a rupture of diplomatic relations with that country, a formal disavowal of any intent to offend the United States Government in the seizure and removal from Peru of the provisional president of that republic, Señor Calderon, together with the manifestation of a sincere purpose on the part of Chili to aid Peru either "in restoring the present provisional government," (note this curious turn of expression!) "or in establishing in its place one which will be allowed the proper freedom of action necessary to restore internal order, and to conduct real negotiations to some substantial result." The other was "to impress upon Chili" the strong objection of the United States to any attempt on her part at exacting from Peru a cession of territory, and the strong desire of the United States that Chili should allow Peru the opportunity of ransoming her territory by a reasonable, not "an extravagant," indemnity.

CHILI MUST NOT HAVE TARAPACA.

Was this really the last word of the Secretary's official diplomacy in regard to the conflicts in South America? If so, what explanation can be given of the previous dispatch sent by cable October 27, 1881, to General Hurlbut at Lima: "Influence of your position must not be used in aid of the Credit Industriel or any other financial or speculative association?" How was Tarapaca under this policy to be rescued from the grasp of Chili otherwise than through the plan of the "Credit Industriel?" Was there any other possible way in which Tarapaca could be redeemed from the power of Chili save the payment by Peru of an indemnity to Chili? Had not Mr. Evarts admitted this when he first entertained the propositions of the Credit Industriel as a great body of the foreign creditors of Peru? If the United States meant to save Tarapaca in June, why was the minister of the United States at Lima peremptorily ordered in October not to "use the influence of his position" in aid of the company which was to be the instrument of saving Tarapaca?

Whatever may be said of the plan of the Credit Industriel it cannot be said that it sought the "aid" of the United States as a "financial and speculative association." Its contracts with the Government of Peru arose out of the debts of Peru in Europe, and long antedated the negotiations conducted by the Secretary. If this cable dispatch of October 27 was not intended to cover some unacknowledged scheme still hidden in the general terms "any other financial or speculative association," it must have been intended to check and thwart any negotiations then going on at Lima for a peace to be based on the plans of the Credit Industriel, or, in other words, to check and thwart the ostensible object itself of all this "brilliant policy"—the settlement, namely, of the troubles on the west coast with indemnity to Chili, without loss of territory to Peru, and under the disinterested influence of the United States!

Mr. Blaine surrendered the portfolio of State to Mr. Frelinghuysen on the 17th of December, 1881, and on the very day before doing so he sent a dispatch to Mr. Trescot, which, with the permission of the House, I will read from the volume of correspondence, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 16, 1881.

SIR: Some erroneous statements, now being circulated in a portion of the American press, may reach Santiago and create an injurious impression in the minds of the Chilian Government; and I write you this instruction from excess of caution, in order that no enduring harm may result.

The erroneous statements in the press to which I especially refer are those which represent this Government as in some way giving encouragement to the Cochet claim against Peru, which, being acknowledged, should enable the United States to pay an indemnity to Chili and then practically own Peru, either directly or through an association of American citizens.

This is the extreme statement, and it has many shadings and variations.

You will take prompt and special care to anticipate any evil that might result from these rumors being circulated by a disavowal and denial of them in whole and in any part.

The only claim for which this Department has instructed our minister at Lima to use his good offices is that known as the Landreau claim, and this to the extent only of insisting that Mr. Landreau should be permitted to have an authoritative investigation of his claim by the Peruvian Government, and that if found to be good and valid it should be provided for in any treaty with Chili which might affect the property to which it attaches.

The law officer of the Department of State, as long ago as 1874, made an exhaustive report on this claim, and recommended that this Government should interpose its good offices in behalf thereof.

On the 26th of July, 1874, my predecessor, Mr. Secretary Fish, instructed our minister at Lima to use his good offices with the Peruvian authorities in behalf of Mr. John C. Landreau, "with a view of securing from that government a speedy investigation and adjustment of his claim."

On the 20th day of February, 1880, the House of Representatives of the last Congress unanimously passed the following resolution:

"That the petition of John C. Landreau the report made thereon by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the accompanying papers be transmitted to the executive department, with the request that the President take such steps as, in his opinion, may be proper, and in accordance with international law to secure to the said John C. Landreau a final settlement and adjustment of his claim against the Government of Peru; and that, if in his opinion it is proper to do so, the President invite the Government of France to co-operate with the United States in this behalf."

I inclose herewith, for your further information, copies of my instructions to Mr. Hurlbut on this subject. It gives me pleasure to say in this connection that Mr. Hurlbut's action in regard to both the Landreau and Cochet claims has been marked by entire prudence and discretion.

While disabusing the mind of the Chilian Government of any impression that the United States meditates intervention on behalf of private claims, beyond the use of its good offices, you will say that justice seems to demand that Landreau should have an opportunity to be heard in support of his claim before a tribunal in Peru competent to decide it, and that, if decided in his favor, a treaty of peace which might cede territory to Chili should not be made in disregard of any rights which Mr. Landreau may be found, after an impartial judicial investigation, to possess.

Further than this the Department of State has not felt authorized to go, and I must express the hope that the Governments of Peru and Chili, to both of which you are accredited, will recognize the moderation and justice of the request made by this Government.

What is the plain meaning of this extraordinary and, as we may perhaps call it, this testamentary dispatch? We do not want its meaning by construction. We want its true meaning in connection with the whole course of the diplomatic correspondence of which it is the culmination and the close.

To reach this let us consider—

That on the 15th of June General Hurlbut, then going out as United States minister to Peru, was instructed that "the most pressing service" incumbent upon him was to aid the Government of Peru in securing from "friendly powers" assistance which should enable her to escape a cession of territory by enabling her to pay a reasonable war indemnity to Chili; that is to say, by the agency of the Credit Industriel.

That on the 4th of August General Hurlbut, then at Lima, was instructed to make both Peru and Chili understand that no definitive treaty of peace would be permitted by the United States to be made "in disregard of the rights" which an alleged American citizen, Landreau, "might be found to possess" under a contract made by his brother, a French citizen, with the Government of Peru.

That on the 27th of October General Hurlbut was instructed by cable that he must not use the influence of his position in aid of the Credit Industriel, which had proposed to enable Peru to pay a reasonable war indemnity to Chili.

That on the 1st of December Mr. Trescot was instructed to "express the dissatisfaction of the United States," should Chili refuse to permit the formation of any government in Peru not pledged to consent to a cession of Peruvian territory; and to threaten an appeal to the other republics of the continent should Chili refuse the good offices toward peace of the United States based on the right of Peru to demand an opportunity to find indemnity and guarantee without any cession of her territory.

And that on the 16th of December, finally, the Secretary instructs Mr. Trescot that "justice seems to demand" a hearing for Landreau before a competent Peruvian tribunal, and that no treaty of peace ceding territory to Chili must be made in disregard of any rights which Landreau might be declared by such a tribunal to possess.

Why this haste to press such claims before the restoration of self-government in Peru?

If the Secretary on the 4th of August had really sought—as he seemed to do on the 15th of June—the success of a "policy" in South America, would he at that date have interposed an alleged American claim of vast proportions between the prostrate Republic of Peru and the victorious Republic of Chili, insisting that the one should entertain this claim before tribunals not then in existence, and that the other should agree to accept this claim as a "lien" in advance upon any settlements to be made of the questions at issue between herself and her defeated antagonist?

The Landreau claim, as urged on the 4th of August, 1881, became a very awkward obstacle in the way of peace between the warring republics. It belittled and degraded the position of the United States in these negotiations. Instead of an impartial arbiter, to whose action the European powers looked for the adjustment of the claims of their subjects, and the warring American states for the effectual assertion of an American system of international justice, the American Government, in the light of these dispatches of August 4 and December 16, 1881, became a speculative operator upon the helplessness of Peru, the claims of European creditors, and the fears of Chili; and this in behalf of pretensions to which in no circumstances has the American Government any right or authority whatever to lend the weight of its official intervention.

Is it possible to explain this extraordinary incoherence, not in terms alone but in aims and in object, between the South American diplomacy of the State Department, in March, 1881, and in December, 1881?

On the 2d of July, 1881, the tenure of office of the Secretary of State was suddenly challenged by a national calamity. From that dark day to the day in September on which the long agony of President Garfield ended at Long Branch, the question whether the administration of the State Department should remain in the hands of the Secretary hung daily on a single wavering life. Between the 19th of September, when President Garfield died, and the 17th of December, when Mr. Frelinghuysen entered the State Department, the position of Mr. Blaine grew daily more and more uncertain, and he seems to have been willing to leave to his successor a legacy not only of complicated and unsettled public business but of confusion worse confounded in all the foreign relations of the United States. Illustrations of this will readily occur to the House in connection with other questions. I need only turn this light to-day upon the dispatches touching the Credit Industriel, and upon the dispatch of December 16, 1881, touching the Landreau claim, which was sent to Mr. Trescot at Santiago.

What does it recall to us? To answer this final question fairly and fully, we must ask ourselves what would have been the consequences if Mr. Trescot had been permitted by Mr. Frelinghuysen to exact of the Chilian Government a full compliance with the demands which he was authorized by the ex-Secretary in his instructions to make upon that government? As the Landreau claims were urged upon him by the ex-Secretary on the 16th of December, he must have required the Chilian Government to agree, before proceeding to negotiate any terms of peace at all with Peru, that the settlement of the Landreau claim should be adequately guaranteed, the amount of it being of course uncertain and dependent as an ultimate Peruvian adjudication.

Need I take up the time of the House in showing that to make such a demand as this upon Chili was to insure its rejection by that republic? The cession of Tarapaca, that is, the dismemberment of Peru, was to be debated after such a basis of negotiations had been reached. But the governments both of Chili and Peru were to be notified from the outset that provision for the settlement of the Landreau claim must be made before any effectual negotiations for peace could be undertaken. To insist upon this was to make such a negotiation impossible, and to make such a negotiation impossible was to leave the administration of President Arthur face to face with the alternative of surrendering all the pretensions of the United States to influence in South America, or of imposing the will of the United States upon the victorious Republic of Chili by war.

It is not difficult, therefore, to conceive the circumstances in which a necessity might be created for building a large navy, when this House might be absolutely compelled to vote appropriations which would dwarf the sums asked for in this bill. But the diplomacy of this Government from March to December, 1881, went quite far enough in the interest of claimants and speculators upon Peruvian territory. This course prevented the proper and legitimate influence of the United States from being felt, and more than anything else brought about the final dismemberment of Peru. I will not ask the House to listen to the reading of dispatches from which these conclusions are drawn, but I ask leave to print them in the RECORD. A hundred iron-clads in the harbor of Callao could not prevent the unfortunate position in which this Government was placed by its State Department. I do not say that there was a deliberate purpose to bring things to such a pass in our relations with the belligerent states on the Pacific, but I have stated and have endeavored to sum up the results of this diplomacy, and I leave it to this House and to the country to decide what verdict shall be rendered upon such stewardship of such a trust. [Applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when Mr. BELMONT'S time had expired Mr. SPRINGER obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. BELMONT.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, whether it was not his intention to offer an amendment or a substitute proposing the appropriation of a large amount of money to commence the building of a new navy.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I had prepared three different amendments in the nature of substitutes for the provisions of this bill. One proposed an appropriation of $10,000,000 to be spent under the guards and upon the system devised by the Committee on Naval Affairs, set forth in House bill No. 5001 and explained in the accompanying report. I afterward felt that perhaps on an appropriation bill this might be asking too much, and on consultation with the Committee on Appropriations I proposed to offer a substitute appropriating $5,000,000 and authorizing the beginning of the construction of six ships of war, one ram, and several torpedo boats. But the appropriation of $5,000,000 would not complete the work. Upon consultation with a few members of my committee, (for we have not been able to obtain a quorum of late,) and in obedience to the expressed desire of the Committee on Appropriations, I have at last consented to offer no substitute for any portion of this bill, but simply to move to apply to the appropriation of $1,750,000 the same provision guarding and directing the expenditure which we would have applied to the entire appropriation of $10,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all that we can do under the ruling of the Chair upon this bill is to decide whether or not this Government will begin the construction of some new cruising ships of war and whether we shall in this bill provide for the sale of the old and utterly worthless ships which are costing for their care every year $100,000.

We expect to do no more at present. This bill appropriates $1,750,000 for construction and repair; and by the provisions of my amendment and the bill itself so much of this sum as may not be necessary for the purchase of material and the repair of old wooden ships may be expended in laying the keels and beginning the construction of two steel cruisers of war.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman be good enough to tell us how much of this there will be left for that purpose?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I wanted to say to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] when he was discussing a part of the bill which has long since gone out, providing that $400,000 only shall be expended in the repair of old ships, that if you buy the material and repair wooden ships of the United States which are worthy of being still kept upon the sea, you will require more than $1,000,000, perhaps $1,250,000.

So that the Naval Committee, after all their labor, and I think I am entitled to say honest and faithful labor, are able to get through the instrumentality and friendship of the Appropriations Committee $500,000 only to commence the work which the Committee on Naval Affairs design for beginning the construction of two of the best ships of war which float on the ocean. For we want the best, or none.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] comes in and proposes to strike it down to $1,500,000. I hope he will allow us, even on an appropriation bill, as the only means by which we can reach the subject at this session, to have a little money, guarded as we have guarded it and as it is guarded in the amendment, for the commencement of work which the whole country demands. In my judgment there is not a gentleman on that side of the floor who does not agree with me the time has arrived when some wise and prudent legislation should be undertaken in behalf of the Navy of the United States. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BELMONT. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL. I renew it. Now, Mr. Chairman, had I been chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I do not think I would have gone to the trouble of consulting the Committee on Appropriations in reference to naval matters peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Naval Committee. In the first place, the Committee on Appropriations has brought in a bill here, as has been frequently said during this debate, which is not strictly an appropriation bill, but on the contrary contains general legislation never estimated for, either by the Navy or any other Department of the Government.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. O'NEILL. I refer to what has been inserted in the bill, relative to completing the construction of some of the monitors.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. We are not now on that branch of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I understand that, but I am not confining myself in these remarks absolutely to any particular branch of the pending bill. Had I been the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I certainly would not have followed in the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, but would have endeavored to have had inserted a substitute for a much larger amount than the amount of money proposed to be expended in the building of ships provided for in this bill. I consider the clause in the bill as reported has no more right to be in it under a point of order than the clause which the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as I understood, thought of submitting to the Committtee of the Whole for adoption. It would certainly be in order as much as other paragraphs in this bill already full of new legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say here to my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] that this is not strictly an appropriation bill as framed by the Committee on Appropriations, and to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that it is not an extravagant bill, as far as it appropriates money. I think the amount proposed is within a very fair limit as compared to former naval appropriation bills.

But, sir, I am desirous, if we could, to have inserted in this bill several millions of dollars to go on with the building of a navy. I am desirous of that, because I think the country needs a navy. I am also desirous of it because as we have given the discretion to the Secretary of the Navy to take work from one navy-yard to put it in another, or to close certain navy-yards, I want to give him also an opportunity to aid in building up a navy and thus utilize the navy-yards belonging to the Government in various parts of the country which are so convenient in situation and so replete in machinery, and where mechanical skill and labor can be so amply supplied in all of them.

I am not, as I said before in this debate, in favor of closing the navy-yards. I am in favor of constructing a navy, and, in my judgment, the original idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts in that regard should have been carried out, and he should have presented his substitute and insisted upon it. The Secretary of the Navy would have had then ample work to keep open all the navy-yards on the Atlantic coast, as well as the Mare Island navy-yard. The country certainly wants a navy, and I do not know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts should not even yet offer a substitute to this bill taking out all which has been inserted by the Committee on Appropriations in the shape of new legislation, and making instead ample appropriations for constructing vessels, thus keeping up the Navy establishment of the country as it should be maintained.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. O'NEILL. I do.

Mr. ATKINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I offer the following substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 396 to the end of line 409, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and like material. Any portion of said sum not required for the purposes aforesaid may be applied toward the construction of two steam cruising vessels of war, which are hereby authorized, the same to be constructed of steel, of domestic manufacture, having a tensile strength of not less than 60,000 pounds to the square inch, and a ductility in eight inches of not less than 20 per cent.; said vessels to be provided with full sail-power and full steam-power.

"One of said vessels shall be of not less than five thousand nor more than six thousand tons displacement, and shall have the highest attainable speed, and shall be armed with not more than four breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 8-inch caliber, or two of 10-inch caliber, and not more than twenty-one breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 6-inch caliber; one of said vessels shall be of not less than four thousand three hundred nor more than four thousand seven hundred tons displacement, and shall have the highest attainable speed, and shall be armed with four breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 8-inch caliber, or two of 10-inch caliber, and not more than fifteen breech-loading rifled cannon, of high power, of not less than 6-inch caliber.

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby empowered and directed to organize a board of naval officers and experts for his advice and assistance, to be called the 'naval board of advice and survey,' to serve during the period required for the construction, armament, and trial of the vessels hereby authorized to be constructed, and no longer. Said board shall consist of five officers on the active list of the Navy in the line and the staff, to be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy, without reference to rank and with reference only to character, experience, knowledge, and skill, and two persons of established reputation and standing, experts in science and in the arts of ship-building, steam-engineering, and naval ordnance, to be selected from civil life and employed for this sole duty by the Secretary of the Navy, and to be paid such sum, out of the appropriation hereby made, not exceeding $50,000, as he may direct: Provided, however, That no person shall be a member of said board who has any interest, direct or indirect, in any invention, device, or process, patented or otherwise, to be used in the construction of said vessels, their engines, boilers, or armament.

"It shall be the duty of said board to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy, in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to them by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein and to the construction thereof, and especially relative to the harmonious adjustment, respectively, of their hulls, machinery, and armament; and they shall examine all materials to be used in said vessels, and inspect the work on the same as it progresses, and have general supervision thereof, under the direction of said Secretary. But said board shall have no power to make or enter into any contract, nor to direct or control any officer of the Navy, the chief of any bureau of the Navy, or any contractor, but shall in all things be subject to the order and direction of said Secretary.

"Neither of the vessels hereby authorized to be built shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers, shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board, or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and after said drawings and specifications have been provided, adopted, and approved as aforesaid, and the work has been commenced or a contract made for it, they shall not be changed in any respect, when the cost of such change shall in the construction exceed $100, except upon the approval of said board, or a majority of the members thereof, in writing, and upon the written order of the Secretary of the Navy; and if changes are thus made, the actual cost thereof and the damage caused thereby shall be ascertained, estimated, and determined by said board; and in any contract made pursuant to this act it shall be provided in the terms thereof that the contractor shall be bound by the determination of said board, or a majority thereof, as to the amount of the increased or diminished compensation said contractor shall be entitled to receive, if any, in consequence of such change or changes.

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to cause either of the said cruising vessels of war aforesaid to be provided with interior deflective steel armor, if the same, upon full investigation, shall seem to be practicable and desirable, and if the same shall be approved by said board, or a majority thereof, in writing. Before any of the vessels hereby authorized shall be contracted for or commenced, the Secretary of the Navy shall, by proper notice, invite all engineers and mechanics of established reputation, and all reputable manufacturers of vessels, steam-engines, boilers, and ordnance, having or controlling regular establishments and being engaged in the business, all officers of the Navy, and especially all naval constructors, steam-engineers, and ordnance officers of the Navy, having plans, models, or designs of any vessels of the classes hereby authorized or of any part thereof, within any given period, not exceeding sixty days, to submit the same to said board; and it shall be the duty of said board to carefully and fully examine the same and to hear any proper explanation thereof, and to report to the Secretary of the Navy, in writing, whether, in their opinion, any such plan, model, or design, or any suggestion therein, is worthy of adoption in the construction of said vessels, their engines, boilers, or armament; and if in such construction any such plan, model, design, or suggestion shall be adopted, for the use of which any citizen not an officer of the Navy would have a just claim for compensation, the Secretary of the Navy shall report the facts to Congress, with a statement of the amount which in his opinion should be paid to such person: Provided, That said board of advice and survey herein provided for shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, prepare plans, drawings, and specifications for vessels, their machinery and armament recommended by the late naval advisory board not herein authorized to be built."

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the question of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. My first point of order, sir, is that it provides for the construction of two new cruising vessels, with many provisions of legislation in reference to their construction, describing particularly how they shall be built, and entering into details of material, &c. In the next place, it provides in detail for an advisory board, and their duties are prescribed by the same amendment. These propositions are changes of existing law and do not retrench expenditures, and therefore are not in order on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I think, with due deference, of course, to the opinion of the Chair, that while in the ruling recently made the Chair may have been in error in holding the text of this portion of the bill to be in order, I submit, that having been done, the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to perfect that text, being a provision for two cruisers, is entirely within the scope of that same provision and necessarily in order. Then I submit to my friend from Georgia that this proposition or amendment is intended as a safeguard to protect as far as possible the interests of the Government in the making of contracts necessary for the building of these vessels of war. The amendment is intended in that way, and as being a safeguard or measure of protection. While I might agree with my friend from Georgia and differ with the Chair upon the ruling recently had, still, if the text of the bill be in order, necessarily this amendment, which is in the interest of economy and protects the public interest, is unquestionably in order. It cannot be ruled out for the same reason that the text of the bill shall not be ruled out.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, when it was determined that this House might in this appropriation bill apply a certain portion of this amount of $1,750,000 for the construction of new vessels of war, I take it that it has the right at the same time to provide any method that it might legitimately use for the wise expenditure of that money. This amendment provides that the ships shall be built of steel. All this provision in the bill is new legislation, and therefore the authority to build the ships is new legislation. The authority to build them of steel is new legislation, and the authority to throw around the vessels the board of advice and survey, to see that the money is properly expended, is also new legislation. It seems to me if the appropriation in the first instance is in order, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] then we have the right to limit the expenditure of the money in any manner we may see fit, and therefore it is a legitimate subject for an amendment to this portion of the bill, and is in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, to my mind there can be no question but what the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is in order. As has been well stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself and by the gentleman from Tennessee, when an appropriation is in order in the first instance looking to the building of new ships, and that legislation is before the committee for consideration and for amendment, any and every amendment is in order that is germane to that proposition. Every possible restriction that can be conceived, every direction that Congress wishes to give to the Navy Department in the expenditure of that money, must be legitimate and in order as being a part of the original proposition.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, there is an underlying mistake and misconception of the law, I think, in the minds of many gentlemen with regard to the powers and duties of the Navy Department, and that mistake often leads them astray upon points of order. We hear it frequently stated here upon this floor that ships of war cannot be built without express legislation, and that to authorize their building is new legislation. This is a mistake. The contrary is true. As the law now stands the Navy Department, acting under the orders of the Executive, as all heads of Departments act under his orders, has a right to build any ship it pleases, provided Congress appropriates money enough for it. And if an appropriation of $10,000,000 in a round sum were appropriated to that Department there is discretion already lodged there, without additional legislation, to build as many ships as that sum would build. The act organizing the Navy Department defines that. It will be found in section 417 of the Revised Statutes:

The Secretary of the Navy shall execute such orders as he shall receive from the President—

As all Secretaries or heads of Departments do—relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the naval establishment.

So that the Navy Department, when unrestricted by law, if they have an appropriation, are entitled to build ships therewith. It does not require new legislation to apply such fund to the building of ships. They are restrained, Mr. Chairman, by statute when the statute exists. Now, there is no law on the statute-book which restrains the building of these or any other kinds of ships. There is no law on the statute-book which says the President and the Secretary of the Navy, acting under his orders, shall not construct, rebuild, substantially repair, or build from keel to deck any ship; and the law is explicit on that point. So much for that mistake.

Now, then, if that is the law, what are we doing here? We are appropriating money for the construction of ships, according to law. We seek to appropriate $1,750,000 for that purpose. In making that appropriation, the power that makes the appropriation has a right to make it upon conditions which they themselves impose. They have a right to make a special appropriation upon rules upon regulations under safeguards and according to conditions which they themselves impose. I do not think it can be said under any circumstances that Congress, if they have a right to appropriate without conditions, may not also appropriate under appropriate and proper safeguards. If that be true, there can be no point of order lying against this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Whether the one position or the other may be the correct one—the position that the point of order would have laid to the original text touching these new vessels or the position of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] that that appropriation was clearly in order—whether the one proposition or the other be correct, I submit that that portion of this amendment which goes beyond the mere appropriation of money is clearly within the rule of objection of legislation upon appropriation bills. For instance, the gentleman says this is but a restriction, a method of controlling the legislation. I have heard that argument submitted over and over again during this session to the Chair. It has been said you may say, by way of amendment and to control the expenditure of money, no part of it shall be applied to political purposes. But that was held to be out of order because it was a restriction on the expenditure of the money, necessarily involving a new principle of legislation.

Now, this amendment goes away beyond anything proposed heretofore, for it proposes the organization of an independent board; and that board, the Chair will observe, not composed merely of naval officers with certain definite powers, but it goes to the extent of employing persons from civil life for whom of course compensation must be provided.

Therefore whatever may be said as to the original question whether an appropriation like this is in order for the building of a ship, it is very clear that legislation proceeding beyond the appropriation of money comes within the third clause of the twenty-first rule of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] might very well have come down to a later period than the act organizing the Navy Department to have ascertained whether there had been any improvements upon it suggested by experience. I have before me two sections which, I think, materially modify and which destroy the power beyond question which the gentleman claims. Section 3732, which was passed in 1861, reads thus:

No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made unless the same is authorized by law or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment.

except in the War and Navy Departments, for clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, or transportation, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year.

And in 1870, for the very purpose of taking from the Departments the power the gentleman claims, the following section was enacted:

No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year or involve the Government in any contract for the future payments of money in excess of such appropriations.

Where then, unless Congress shall have provided for it by law, unless Congress shall have provided the appropriations, does the gentleman get the authority which he claims? And the gentleman will remember that in reference to the Puritan and various other vessels about which he made a contract on the day before the expiration of his term of office, whether he was right or wrong, from that hour until this the Navy Department have held there was no law for it, and have refused to go forward with it. It was not my purpose to bring that up save for illustration, as an instance of recent date, illustrating the action of the Department.

As to the other argument, suggested by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] that there being a provision for new cruisers, that having been decided to be in order, therefore it was in order to make additional legislation—let us see. The rule declares that no legislation shall be in order upon an appropriation bill unless the same is germane thereto and retrenches expenditures in ways specified, by reducing the amount, &c. The Chair will bear in mind that this vague constructive idea of retrenchment, of better legislation and better regulations in the manner of the expenditure of funds, is excluded by a specification of what the rule does mean, by reducing the amount in the bill, reducing the number of officers, &c. That, the Chair will observe, is the rule.

The proposition is made here containing legislation, and it is allowed by the Chair on the ground that the point of order was not made upon it in time—upon that distinct proposition before the House—nothing more; and it is ruled in for that reason. Now, it is argued that the subject-matter being before the House, you can bring forward additional legislative propositions. Does this argument proceed from any fair construction of this rule? The first never would have got in but for the fact that the point of order was not made in time. Whenever it is in, is it to be held that any amendments can be made containing additional propositions? I think not. If that be true why does the gentleman from Massachusetts say "two" vessels? He has got the subject here; why restrain himself at all? You have got the subject of the reconstruction of the Navy here; you are going to let your old ships rot; you are going to prevent their repair; you are looking forward to the building of a new navy; why not take the whole subject in? Why is not everything in order, if this argument is to be regarded? Here is a proposition in reference to two cruising ships. The gentleman from Massachusetts comes forward with a proposition for two vessels, prescribing their dimensions, prescribing all the details as to the character of the vessels, as to the mode of their construction, providing an advisory board and prescribing its duty, fixing all these details as a matter of law, which does not exist in this bill and does not exist in any present law. But gentlemen ask the Chair to hold, in the face of that rigid rule excluding legislation on an appropriation bill, that this liberal view shall be taken and that this bar shall be broken down. If it is not to be adhered to essentially why regard it at all?

Mr. SPRINGER. In reference to the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] I desire to add the further point, that this proposition is in substance the same as a bill now pending before the House, namely, House bill No. 5001, authorizing the construction of vessels of war for the Navy of the United States, and for other purposes. If the Chair will look at the second clause of the pending amendment, he will find that it is in substance the same as section 4 of the bill to which I have referred, and which I will send to the Chair. I read from that section:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby empowered and directed to organize a board of naval officers and experts for his advice and assistance, to be called the "naval board of advice and survey," to serve during the period required for the construction, armament, and trial of the vessels hereby authorized to be constructed, and no longer. Said board shall consist of five officers on the active list of the Navy in the line and the staff, to be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy, without reference to rank and with reference only to character, experience, knowledge, and skill, and two persons of established reputation and standing, experts in science and in the arts of ship-building, steam-engineering, and naval ordnance, to be selected from civil life and employed for this sole duty by the Secretary of the Navy, and to be paid such sum, out of the appropriation hereby made, not exceeding $50,000, as he may direct, &c.

Then the Chair will find other sections of the bill set forth verbatim in this amendment. In reference to the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] I was somewhat surprised at the novel doctrine announced by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] that unless there was some statute forbidding a thing to be done, it was not a change of existing law to authorize a thing to be done not mentioned in existing statutes. It is a change of existing law to authorize anything to be done that cannot now be done under the statute?

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman pardon me one moment?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. If the law authorizes the construction of ships, restrained only by the provision that they shall not be constructed unless there is an appropriation for that purpose, is it a change of existing law to make in an appropriation bill an appropriation for the purpose?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not the point.

Mr. ROBESON. That is the whole point here.

Mr. SPRINGER. In addition to the appropriation here proposed is a provision authorizing a board of advice and survey to be appointed, two of the persons constituting that board to be taken from civil life, and the sum of $50,000 is appropriated for the purpose of paying the expenses and salaries of that board under the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, that is a most extraordinary provision, and is brought before this Committee of the Whole under the guise of a provision in the interest of economy, retrenchment, and reform, as gentlemen over there are now pleased to advocate. They reform by creating a new board; they retrench by authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to expend $50,000 to pay the expenses of that board.

The board is to have full control of all the designs, plans, models, specifications, and contracts for such vessels and all their parts, is to have full authority relative to the materials to be used; in fact, it is to be a most extraordinary board, having power to build a new navy. And gentlemen say that it is not a change of existing law, and that it retrenches expenditures. Now, let us see what the rule is. I read from clause 3 of Rule XXI:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Now, there is nothing of that kind in this amendment. What is the existing law on this subject? The gentleman from Georgia has very kindly furnished me with the statute on that subject. Section 3679 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

Now, there being no appropriation by existing law sufficient to do the work provided for in this bill, gentlemen propose to make a law by which this expenditure can be begun and unlimited expenditures incurred for the future. There is no proposition in this bill to make this a complete work to finish these vessels. It is the beginning of an end which will cost from forty to fifty millions of dollars before it is reached. And gentlemen claim that they are inaugurating this reconstruction of the Navy in the interest of economy, and under a rule which prohibits it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if he is opposed to the continuance of the Navy or to the construction of any new vessel for the Navy?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the gentleman. I am opposed to the provisions which are now attempted to be inaugurated upon an appropriation bill. When the Democratic party was in power in this House gentlemen over there took exceeding alarm at a few simple clauses in an appropriation bill which were intended to secure freedom of elections. And now, in the very first session after they have come into power again in this House, they have brought in more legislative provisions on appropriation bills than were attempted during the whole six years the Democratic party had control of this House. The first bill brought in here to make appropriations for the support of the Navy contains provisions to provide for the reconstruction of the Navy. And the amendment proposed now by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] and others which have been suggested open up this bill to a magnificent expenditure of money, to the construction of a magnificent navy, which will cost sums of money that no man can now estimate or compute.

The amendment is clearly out of order, and I am opposed to using this appropriation bill for the beginning of the construction of a new navy.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the following language, beginning in line 391:

And any part of the said appropriation not used for repairs may be applied toward the construction of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance with the recommendation of the naval advisory board, as approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives in their report, No. 653, made to the House of Representatives, &c.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts simply formulates what we find in that report. The original text of the bill refers to a certain report and provides that these ships shall be built in accordance with the recommendations contained in that report. It is the charter according to which they are to be built; it contains the instructions. It recommends the appointment of an advisory board. Now, the Committee on Appropriations, having in the original text of the bill provided that these vessels shall be constructed in accordance with that report, the gentleman from Massachusetts now comes in and presents in a formulated and detailed manner the instructions contained in the report. That is all he proposes to do. The amendment does nothing more than exhibit in detail the plan embraced in the report; it does not add anything. If the bill should be passed with the clause in its original form, these ships would have to be built in accordance with the plan embraced in that report; yet for certainty it is better that the amendment should be adopted.

Perhaps it is unnecessary to allude to the last point made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] The substantive part of the bill to which he has referred is an appropriation of $10,000,000. Then there were added details for the expenditure of the money. The main feature of the other bill was the appropriation of this sum, and a specification of the manner in which it should be expended. Now, we propose the expenditure of a smaller sum of money, and have simply adopted some of the details of that bill with reference to the expenditure. The amendment certainly is not repugnant to the subdivision of the rule to which attention has been called. But whether it be repugnant or not, I say, sir, that when you confront the provisions of the bill to which I have last called attention, the only question for you to consider is whether the amendment is germane.

I cannot understand the policy of gentlemen on this floor who object to the amendment. I cannot understand why the gentleman from Georgia, of all men in the world, should object to it. This amendment proposes simply to provide a protection to the Government in the expenditure of the money. It embraces provisions to guard against the Department doing or attempting to do that which is not desired or contemplated by Congress. It is a restriction upon the power of the Department; and I certainly cannot understand why the gentleman from Georgia should oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to decide the question of order. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] intimated that as the Chair had ruled to admit the original text of the bill this amendment was germane and ought therefore to be admitted. The Chair desires to state that upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia upon the text of the bill the Chair ruled that the point came too late, and did not decide whether the provisions of the text were obnoxious to the rule or not.

Now the Chair finds no difficulty in deciding that so far as regards the appropriation for new vessels, ample authority is given in section 417 of the Revised Statutes, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 417. The Secretary of the Navy shall execute such orders as he shall receive from the President relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the naval establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this section of the Revised Statutes gives ample authority to the House of Representatives to vote money for the building of new vessels. It puts it in the power of the Secretary of the Navy to carry out the provisions of a law of this kind when authorized and instructed so to do by the President of the United States. Hence so far as regards that portion of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts relating to this branch of the subject the Chair finds no difficulty in determining the question of order. But in reference to that portion of the amendment providing for the appointment of an advisory board, to be paid out of this appropriation, the Chair is in doubt, and this being a matter of some moment to the country he believes it proper to submit to the Committee of the Whole for determination the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ROBESON. The point as to the advisory board?

The CHAIRMAN. While the Chair has no doubt as to any portion of the amendment except that relating to the advisory board, he desires to submit the whole question to the Committee of the Whole, to be decided by it. The question is, Shall the point of order submitted by the gentleman from Georgia be sustained?

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. While the gentleman from Georgia made his point against the whole amendment he especially called the attention of the Chair to that portion providing for the advisory board.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware of that.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is an important feature of this proposition, and that portion of it in any event should be submitted to the House unembarrassed by the other portions of the proposition. I hope the Chair will submit it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to submit the whole question of order for the decision of the Committee of the Whole. The point of order involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts goes to the construction of new vessels and to the appropriation for that purpose as well as to provision for an advisory board. While the Chair has no doubt as to the amendment, except as to the last clause providing for an advisory board, it desires to submit the whole question to the Committee of the Whole to determine it as a point of order lying against the whole amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the Chair overlooks the fact that the point of order was made specially against this advisory board portion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it best to submit the whole question to the Committee of the Whole for determination. The question is on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] and those in favor of sustaining the point of order will vote "ay," and those against it will vote "no."

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 62.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. ROBESON as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 93.

So the point of order was overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose is substantially that found in House bill No. 5001. That bill was designed after much labor.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the point of order I made and which the Chair has not ruled on, that it was substantially House bill No. 5001.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in view of the decision by the committee, overrules the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Massachusetts says it is the same bill, and the Chair overrules the point that it is, but the law is always with the court.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. For the last four Congresses this very question which is now embodied in this amendment, this system, has been proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs. Under the lead of the gentleman from Tennessee the Committee on Naval Affairs reported to this House two or three bills, in each of which an attempt was made to rebuild the Navy, but in order to secure harmony in the action of the Navy Department, in order to prevent great failures in the future, as there have been great failures in the past, we have felt it the duty of Congress in authorizing the expenditure of money to say to these heads of bureaus, "While we are willing to give you authority to spend money in your several departments and to manage your several departments, we shall insist on it you shall begin no ship until the entire design of that ship, including hull, engine, &c., has been first considered to determine whether being combined they make a harmonious whole."

That is the purpose of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that has been the purpose of that committee during the last five or six years. I have brought here as representing the Naval Committee no new system, but I have undertaken to bring here a perfected system, so far as we have been able in the committee to perfect it.

On one of our bills we recommended a board, called a board of assistants, with a power somewhat akin to the old admiralty board.

At one time we assembled at the Navy Department and listened to the advice of naval officers, and our bill was changed in obedience to their views. To-day the amendment now before this House has the approval of every intelligent officer of the Navy who has done us the honor of calling on us and giving us his opinion. It has the approval of the present Secretary of the Navy.

Now, we believe if you begin the construction of cruising ships of war you should begin and guard the expenditure of money, so that the hull, the engine, and everything else should be arranged beforehand. The experience of the past has been that a good hull and a good engine, and good guns which do not fit each other make a worthless ship. That is the experience of the past, and we would guard against it in the future.

Now, sir, we are only authorizing the building of two ships here, but we establish a board of advice and survey to whom every proposition relating to these ships must be first submitted by the Secretary. The original bill which the Committee on Naval Affairs designed and proposed to submit for the consideration of the House contemplated the construction of two first-class ships, four of the second class, one steel ram, and several torpedo-boats, and the amount contemplated for this purpose was estimated at $10,000,000. In that bill we also provided for the board of advice and survey to take into consideration questions arising in connection with their construction. But this provides for only two ships, and yet it still provides for same protection to be derived from the experience and recommendations of the board of advice and survey. And this morning I have written for the first time an amendment which is appended to the printed amendment I submitted a few days since, that this board of survey and advice should, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, go forward and occupy their time devising plans, models, and specifications for other ships not authorized in this bill. I confess, sir, my gratification at being able to get once before the United States House of Representatives a proposition involving a policy for the future with regard to the American Navy. I trust the amendment will be adopted, and I believe if it is adopted we shall in the future have a navy worthy of our flag and worthy of the officers who belong to our Navy.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy the attention of the committee but very briefly. Now, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] in one breath would have this committee understand that we have scarcely any navy to-day. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] was very anxious in his remarks to convey the impression that Congress should make sufficient appropriations to build one ship that would be worthy of the nation. Now I read:

We have some twenty live-oak ships—they are wooden ships to be sure, but they are good ships, good cruising vessels, and they are exhibiting the flag of the country in all the waters of the earth, and they have ever been sufficient to secure for us in all harbors and oceans that respect which the Stars and Stripes at the head of a naval vessel of the United States ought always to command.

"Twenty good live-oak ships—good cruisers." That is the language of the Secretary of the Navy himself in his recent speech at the Revere House in Boston. Now, sir, the impression is sought to be conveyed here in this debate that we have no ships worthy to be called ships; while here the Secretary of the Navy himself says that we have twenty good ships, ships worthy of the country, floating our flag upon all the waters of the earth. Besides that he says:

We have fourteen iron-clads fit for service.

Now, I do not see any very great necessity for being in a hurry about building up a navy. Let us wait, sir, until naval invention and naval construction shall have reached that perfection which will present a model that we may safely adopt. Naval construction is constantly changing. There is no fixed model by which we could be safely guided in such a large expenditure. Up to this time naval authorities have differed widely as to what kind of vessels we should construct. And besides, I repeat, there is no imminent necessity, nor is there any emergency resting upon this Government at this time which demands any such hasty action. We have no foreign complications that require us to begin, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has just admitted we should begin, a great naval policy. Is it the purpose of this committee, is it the purpose of the gentleman at the head of the Naval Committee of this House, and is it the purpose of the Administration to begin to construct a navy which shall be equal to the first-class naval powers of the earth?

Of what avail is that to us? Why, sir, there is nothing in that to force us to take such an extraordinary step. We are not forced by any present or prospective complications to have a navy to defend ourselves. We have a commerce, it is true, but we have already a navy sufficient to defend that commerce. It is not menaced. It is true that we need a merchant marine, but that is a totally different thing from a naval establishment such as is contemplated here; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts and those who agree with him in his views on this question would inquire where the trouble is with regard to our merchant marine, he would find that it exists in your tax laws; in your laws with regard to the building of ships; laws that have existed upon the statute-books for nearly a hundred years. There is where the trouble is, and also in your protective tariff. There lies the difficulty, and there, Mr. Chairman, is where the trouble exists. But, I repeat, sir, we do need a merchant marine; I admit that, and, while admitting it, claim that it is an entirely different proposition from that which is before the House or that which is attempted to be inaugurated here, a policy which, if entered upon, as the gentleman from Illinois has well said, would involve this Government in an expenditure of from forty to fifty millions of dollars.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Tennessee does me some injustice when he says that as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I am trying to inaugurate the policy of building up a great navy which shall be equal to that of the maritime powers of Europe. I deny such a statement for myself—nothing can be found in my remarks to justify the belief that such are my views, and if the gentleman from Tennessee will do me the honor to read the report submitted by the committee he can find no such thing in it.

Mr. Chairman, we have thirty-eight ships now called cruising vessels of war. The Kearsarge is one of them, and I call her to mind now because I referred to her the other day in the speech I made. To-day she is a better and abler ship than she was when she won that victory over the Alabama. She carries at midships the same guns with which she won that victory; and those guns when she was in the ports of England and France were looked upon as the most powerful guns afloat in the world. The Kearsarge can fight another Alabama to-day with as good a chance of winning the victory she did in 1864. And yet she is not a match for any cruising ship of any great naval power in the world. Why? Because while we have waited all Europe has moved in the manufacture of guns until the Kearsarge could be beaten and not get within range of the enemy. We have other ships, good ships, in time of peace as good and better than the Kearsarge, but they are not the ships of to-day.

I say to my friend from Tennessee that George Washington, the father of our country, said, I do not quote his exact words, "In time of peace we should prepare for war." We are in a time of profound peace. We are not prepared for war. No man will rise in his place and say we are reasonably prepared.

And now, sir, the gentleman says I propose to inaugurate a great policy. If I used the word "great," which I do not remember, I did not mean great in the sense in which the gentleman from Tennessee uses the word. I meant that good, sound, and substantial policy which should govern the construction of all ships of war in the United States in the immediate future. We want no great navy. We have no colonial dependencies to keep in subjection. We have no enemy upon our border whom we expect to fight. The war of the future with this country is to be a war upon the ocean, and the victories are to be won in ships of war.

Now, sir, we may look back through the history of the world and satisfy ourselves that any nation that is unprepared for war invites it; and that any nation that is fully prepared is always in a condition to escape war. This, sir, is the policy of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and every gentleman, every Republican and every Democrat on the committee have acted harmoniously on this. We are a unit, and no politics have got into this bill until it got on the floor of this House. The policy of every member of the Naval Committee is a policy which is patriotic in every purpose. We will put our country on the ocean in a condition of respectability before the world, and put it in a condition to defend our honor. This is the policy of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] on having performed a feat this morning that nobody else has performed or ever can or ever will be able to perform. We were told by the Naval Committee of the Forty-fourth, the Forty-fifth, and the Forty-sixth Congresses all Democratic committees, that there was no navy. My friend's colleague, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] who was then the chairman of the committee, said in his report to the Forty-fifth Congress:

In comparison with the leading naval powers of the world, we occupy a very humiliating and unsatisfactory condition; but we had better know and appreciate it now, and, if possible, provide the remedy, than be startled by the revelation at a period of impending danger.

It is for Congress to say, with the evidence before it, what measures shall be taken to place the country in a condition for defense, and to provide the means for carrying the flag of the country in honor and safety upon the sea. The people of the United States will not long consent to this present condition of weakness and possible danger.

The Committee on Naval Affairs in the Forty-sixth Congress say:

We want a navy capable of protecting our commerce in all seas, of defending our own borders from invasion, and of destroying the commerce and sea-going cruisers of any nation which may make war on us.

To do the first, we should put our iron-clad fleet in condition of the greatest efficiency; we should also develop the torpedo system to its fullest extent. This arm of defense is American in origin, and has performed its greatest service on this side the Atlantic. It deserves our fostering care. It may be improved and carried to a state of perfection not now conceived of if we will invite and encourage our inventors to give the subject their best efforts. With our iron clad fleet in condition for coast and harbor defense, and our torpedo system perfected, 45,000,000 Americans may defy all danger of foreign invasion.

The following is the language of the President of the United States in his message at the opening of the present Congress:

I cannot too strongly urge upon you my conviction that every consideration of national safety, economy, and honor imperatively demands a thorough rehabilitation of our Navy.

With a full appreciation of the fact that compliance with the suggestions of the head of that Department and of the advisory board must involve a large expenditure of the public moneys, I earnestly recommend such appropriations as will accomplish an end which seems to me so desirable.

The Naval Committee of this Congress say in their report:

Longer to delay action looking to the building up of our Navy would, in the opinion of your committee, be not only folly but even crime. No nation can afford to be shorn of its powers of offensive or defensive war, and this great nation, bounded by two oceans and having a sea-coast line of greater extent than that of any other nation on the globe, and furnishing material for commerce greater than that of any other nation, is practically defenseless at home and could strike but a feeble blow on the sea. The wasteful extravagance of such a condition would be manifest in one day of war with any great naval power. To block up for a single day the great harbor of our commerce by the fleet of our enemy would cost our people more than would be the cost of an invincible navy. To shut up our great seaports, from which flow out to the markets of the world our surplus products, for one week, would work a mischief incalculable and cause a loss greater than the cost of a hundred of the heaviest ships of war of the world. Readiness for war will prevent such calamity. To be unprepared for war is to invite it. No maritime nation is less prepared for war than ours to-day.

Every report of every Secretary of the Navy, every message of every President in recent years has testified to the pitiable and humiliating condition of the American Navy. And yet, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] by some curious glass, one never known to mariner, never known to the explorer of the heavens, has this morning found a good navy floating the flag of the United States.

Mr. ATKINS. I read the speech of the present Secretary of the Navy. He is very good authority.

Mr. ELLIS. Here is his report.

Mr. ATKINS. Here is his speech, later than his report. And what the gentleman from Louisiana refers to is not his report; he is mistaken.

Mr. ELLIS. How am I mistaken?

Mr. ATKINS. The present Secretary of the Navy has made no report to Congress.

Mr. ELLIS. The Secretary of the Navy commences his annual report with this earnest appeal in behalf of the Navy:

The condition of the Navy imperatively demands the prompt and earnest attention of Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. That was the language of Secretary Hunt. Here is Secretary Chandler's speech.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not know that Secretary Chandler has spoken. But it is a fact, a palpable and humiliating fact, that the United States is without a navy worthy of the name. She has thirty-eight ships capable of cruising; and it is a known fact there is not one of them that could catch an ordinary mail packet, one of the merchant marine of England. An ordinary ship in the merchant-marine service of Great Britain would outrun the best and swiftest ship of war that floats under the United States flag.

And yet the gentleman has—I will not say the effrontery, I will not say the temerity—the gentleman rises in his place and informs us that we now have a good navy of twenty ships of war.

Mr. Chairman, I am heart and hand with the Committee on Naval Affairs in their efforts to rehabilitate and reconstruct the American Navy. If we ever expect to obtain commercial supremacy, if we ever expect to have our proper rank among the commercial nations of the earth, we must have a navy.

The gentleman from Tennessee says, "Wait; wait until experiments have been made; wait until we can find out the best improvements, the best materials, and the best models for a navy." Is that the principle upon which a nation of ordinary sense conducts its business? Wait! Why did not our fathers wait before making the flint-lock musket and continue to use the old match-lock? Why did they not rest content with the old flint-lock smooth-bore gun while other nations were using Enfield rifles and rifles of other patterns? Sir, it behooves every nation to keep pace with the progress of the world in all these matters.

I shall support the proposed amendment with all my heart. I ask this House to wake up to the necessity of immediately taking steps to rebuild our Navy.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] says we have a navy, and that there is no danger. Why, sir, four or five weeks ago the skies were clear. To-day, while we are debating here, the music of the English and French guns may be jarring the waves on the coast of Africa.

Ireland is to-day stretched once more upon the dissecting table of British policy. We all know the strong Irish feeling in this country. We know the number of Irish voters in this country. And we can well understand that sooner or later that question will enter into our politics. We all know that our democratic people are swayed by influences like these, which may possibly lead to a complication with England.

Mexico is now undergoing a physical conquest by our people. Our railroads and other enterprises are permeating her territory. Before long Mexico will wake up to the fact that she is gradually being subjugated by the United States; and then will come the recoil and the revolt, and the United States may be called upon to conserve the interests and property of her citizens there.

Mr. TALBOTT. I will move to strike out the last word, and will yield my time to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELLIS.]

Mr. ELLIS. I thank my friend from Maryland, [Mr. TALBOTT.] Here is the little puerile power of Chili. If we could be insulted by that puerile power we have had the slap full in the face. Yet we have not a single ship of war—no, our entire Navy could not go down there and stand before the Huascar, one of her ships of war.

Sir, you might select a single ship from one of nine different navies in the world that could destroy our entire Navy in three or four hours. And yet the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] says that we have a navy; that there is no danger; that we should wait.

I have this to say in conclusion: in case of trouble, and trouble may come—wars occur in the lives of all nations—in case that danger comes, in case our people are awakened from their security by the terrible music of bursting shells all along our coasts, by great iron-clads stopping up our ports, laying cities under contribution, ravaging our coasts and subjugating our people, I would not for my right arm be the American Representative who had refused to support a measure like this. I should have to call upon the rocks and the mountains to fall upon me and hide me from the just indignation of an abused and outraged people whose trust I had betrayed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS.]

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 95, noes 7.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that is done I desire to offer an amendment, to strike out all from the word "provided," in line 396, to and including the word "material," in line 401.

The CHAIRMAN. Those words have already been stricken out and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] has just been inserted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I propose to amend that portion of the amendment which prohibits the repair of any wooden vessel except where the expense of such repair shall not exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated value.

Mr. TALBOTT. I make the point that the gentleman cannot move to amend an amendment which has already been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will indicate his amendment, so that the Chair may be able to rule upon it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] contains the same thing which is in the printed bill and I propose to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] contains the amendment which was offered to the original bill by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly it does.

The CHAIRMAN. All that portion of the bill was stricken out and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts has been inserted in its place.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that, and I propose to amend the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is not in order.

Mr. TALBOTT. I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot now move an amendment to an amendment which has been adopted; he could have moved it before the amendment was adopted, but not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Although it is not in order to strike out by itself what has been inserted, it may be moved to strike out a portion of the original paragraph, comprehending what has been inserted, providing the coherence to be struck out be so substantial as to make this effectively a different proposition.—Manual, page 125.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not proposing to strike out the amendment, but only a part of it.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman moves to strike out a part of the amendment already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF STEAM-ENGINEERING.

For repairs, completion, and preservation of machinery and boilers in vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase and preservation of all materials and stores; and patent rights, purchase, fitting, and repair of machinery and tools in the navy-yards and stations; wear, tear, and repair of machinery and boilers of naval vessels; incidental expenses, such as foreign postage, telegrams, advertising, freight, photographing, books, and instruments, $2,200,000: Provided, That not more than $400,000 of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the mere repairs of the engines and machinery of wooden ships, and that none of it shall be applied to the repair of the engines and machinery of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed thirty per cent. of the appraised value of the same: And provided further, That $1,000,000 of the above amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Navy to the following objects, namely: to the building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh; to the launching to the best advantage of the iron-clad steamers Monadnock, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror; and to the completion of the engines and machinery of such two of the last-named vessels as he may on examination think most expedient and best for the interests of the service; and that any part of the appropriation for said bureau not used as above specified may be applied toward the construction of engines and machinery of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance with the recommendation of the naval advisory board, as approved by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives in their report numbered 653, made to the House of Representatives March 8, 1882.

Mr. MARTIN. I move to amend——

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman moves an amendment I desire to raise a question of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized to make his point of order.

Mr. KNOTT addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. KNOTT. To make a point of order on the proviso commencing in line 427.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes a point of order, as the Chair understands, upon the entire paragraph.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I propose to make it specifically as to the several provisions of the paragraph. One of them is:

Provided, That not more than $400,000 of the foregoing sum shall be applied to the mere repairs of the engines and machinery of wooden ships.

Now, as to the matter of repairs of engines and machinery it would be competent under the present law for the money to be used in the way that this proviso prohibits; and it makes no reduction of expenditures.

Then, again, the paragraph contains a proposition that none of this money shall be applied to the repair of the engines of any wooden ship where the expense of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the appraised value of the same. That is a legislative provision and does not retrench expenditures.

In the proviso beginning in line 427 it is provided—

That $1,000,000 of the above amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Navy to the following objects, namely: To building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh, and for various other objects not authorized by law.

Again, it provides that—

Any part of the appropriation for said bureau not used as above specified may be applied toward the construction of engines and machinery of two new cruising vessels of iron or steel in substantial accordance with the recommendation of the naval advisory board.

This is all legislation and does not retrench expenditures. These are simply provisions as to how this fund may be used. I make the point of order as to the paragraph, and I make it independently as to these several provisions.

Mr. KNOTT. I rose to make a point of order upon the proviso, commencing in line 427, which proposes to authorize the construction of monitors. I make the point that there is no law authorizing their construction.

I make this point upon the authority of the following statement, made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in his remarks on Thursday last:

I have no wish to enter into a history of those vessels. The humiliating story has often been told. What I desire to do is to call attention to a very extraordinary fact in the history of these monitors which is brought out by the provisions of this bill, and which shows that they have no legal existence, and that the effect of this appropriation is for the first time to give them a legal recognition.

Whether this statement is true or not, I do not know personally, as I have not examined the subject sufficiently to be advised. If it is true that the construction of these monitors is authorized by existing law, that fact can be shown affirmatively by the production of the law. If it cannot be thus shown, I take it as a matter of course that the point of order must be sustained.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to suggest that this clause, without any struggle over it and with all the points of order which have been made still applying, be amended by striking out all after the word "substantial," in lines 439 and 440, down to and including the word "two," in line 445.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that no amendment can be entertained while the point of order is pending.

Mr. HISCOCK. I was asking unanimous consent that this amendment be made, as it might simplify the question somewhat.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to section 417 of the Revised Statutes, upon which the Chair based his ruling on the former point of order. I submit that the provision of this paragraph, after line 422, comes in conflict with that provision of the statutes directing the manner in which the expenditure shall be made.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, is a point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending; but the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that an amendment be made——

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Georgia objects. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia on the point of order, if he desires to be heard. [A pause.] The Chair is of opinion that this paragraph is not subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia. The rules provide:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

The Chair thinks that these are works already in progress, for which appropriations have been made, and therefore the appropriation in this paragraph is clearly in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the cruisers provided for in lines 438 and 439 of this paragraph are already in progress?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been always held by former chairmen of the Committee of the Whole that the committee have a right to define appropriations and the manner in which they shall be used, and the Chair thinks, therefore, anything limiting the appropriation is clearly in order.

Mr. MARTIN. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has exhibited to me an amendment covering exactly the point I intended to present.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Let it be read, and if it does not then the gentleman can submit his proposition.

Mr. MARTIN. I am willing to accept the gentleman's amendment in lieu of my own.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I offer, then, the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, after the word "Provided," in line 421, down to and including the word "same," in line 427, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That no part of said sum shall be applied to the repair of the engines and machinery of wooden ships where the estimated cost of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of new engines and machinery of the same character and power; that $1,000,000 of the above amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Navy to the following objects, namely: To building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh; to the launching to the best advantage of the iron-clad steamers Monadnock, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror; and to the completion of the engines and machinery of said vessels as he may on examination think most expedient and best for the interests of the service."

Strike out all after the word "and," in line 427, down to and including the word "two," at the end of line 445.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If that amendment be adopted, will it be in order to offer additional amendments, or should such amendments be offered now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is it necessary to offer amendments to this amendment at the present time, or can we wait until this has been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. This is to perfect the text, and after it has been adopted it will be in order to move amendments to it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. By striking out part of it, if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Navy Department has sufficient regulations in the matter of expenditure on vessels under existing law. I cannot understand the purpose of this as a matter of regulation. I will first call attention to sections 1538, 1539, 1540, and 1541 of the Revised Statutes. I should consume my time if I should attempt to read them, and therefore I will simply refer to them.

It is provided no more than $3,000 shall be expended on the hull and spars of a vessel without the matter having been submitted to a board appointed by the Secretary of the Navy and that board has recommended it. The same thing is provided as to the repair of sails and rigging.

Then there is a moderate provision directing where vessels are useless to the public service the President himself may direct their sale. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized and directed to sell at public sale such vessels. Then the Secretary is directed to provide the mode of selling unserviceable vessels and materials.

Therefore we have the safeguard of a board in the matter of the improvement of your ships, your rigging, your hull, or any other matter where it involves over $3,000.

We have a provision for the sale of vessels and materials where they are unserviceable, and that provides for a board and is sufficiently guarded. Therefore this proposition in reference to a board has an ulterior object of much more consequence than the mere mode of disposing of old vessels. It directs where the repairs shall exceed 30 per cent. in value of the vessel that nothing shall be done with it. Why? Is there complaint that these boards and former Secretaries have abused their positions? I am informed by an intelligent officer of the Navy that the result of that provision in the Bureaus of Steam Engineering and Construction and Repair will be to annihilate the present Navy, which the present Secretary, in a speech referred to by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] has seen fit to declare of very great value, and has seen fit to declare that committees of Congress have exaggerated the condition of the Navy.

The purpose of this proposition, in my judgment, is to destroy the present Navy and embark us on a system of extravagant expenditure in the construction of new vessels. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the provision in this bill alike will be stricken down.

It is rather amusing that the Committee on Naval Affairs and the distinguished gentleman in charge of this bill in hunting about for some favorable cause to incite these appropriations should have found Chili.

In this report the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs says:

It is manifest that in a conflict with this small nation the United States would be helpless to resist the first attack, the most important thing to do in war always, and Chili could levy tribute on the city of San Francisco, or seal up the Golden Gate as with an iron wall.

Why, sir, it is ludicrous to attempt to extort an appropriation to build up a navy to compete with the great powers of the earth by the possibility of war on our part with the Government of Chili. If the absence of an iron-clad, as indicated by the gentleman from New Jersey, saved us from an imprudent and a criminal war with Chili, it is far better that we should continue to have no navy at all, but rely upon an emergency to create one, rather than in this way to give license to the violation of law, and involve us in foreign wars or difficulties.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, no expression of opinion by any gentleman on this floor could more fully inform this House of the condition of our Navy than the reports of the Committees on Naval Affairs of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, of which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] was chairman.

I clip the following from the report of his committee, Forty-fifth Congress:

In comparison with the leading naval powers of the world we occupy a very humiliating and unsatisfactory condition: but we had better know and appreciate it now, and, if possible, provide the remedy, than be startled by the revelation at a period of impending danger.

It is for Congress to say, with the evidence before it, what measures shall be taken to place the country in a condition for defense, and to provide the means for carrying the flag of the country in honor and safety upon the sea. The people of the United States will not long consent to this present condition of weakness and possible danger.

And I also clip the following extract from the report of his committee in the Forty-sixth Congress:

In comparison with the navies of Great Britain, France, Italy, and even Spain, the American Navy is immensely inferior in ships and armament. And yet these nations have in the construction of their navies but followed out and improved upon American examples and models.

In view of these facts the committee believe it to be our duty to begin at once to prepare for the work of building up a navy adequate to the national defense and to the preservation of the national honor. We cannot expect at once to build up a navy powerful enough to meet in mid-ocean and successfully contend with the monster iron-clads of England, France, and Italy, nor do we desire that the attempt should be made.

We have no colonial dependencies to hold in unwilling subjection, nor jealous rival nation upon our borders to overawe by any exhibition of power. We have no temptation to make aggressive war for conquest upon any transoceanic nation. We have an empire equal to our ambition, not too large, let us hope, to be successfully governed as one nation upon republican principles.

We want a navy capable of protecting our commerce in all seas, of defending our own borders from invasion, and of destroying the commerce and sea-going cruisers of any nation which may make war on us.

From these reports we see that in comparison with the leading powers of the world our Navy occupies a humiliating and unsatisfactory position.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a pamphlet giving "statistics in relation to the navies of the world."

It fully sustains the views of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It shows that our sea-coast everywhere is in an unprotected, defenseless condition. As an illustration, take our South Pacific station. I read the following:

The United States naval force on this, the South Pacific station, consists of four unarmored wooden vessels, namely, Pensacola, (flag-ship,) Alaska, Lackawanna, and Adams. The Pensacola can make eight knots per hour; the Alaska, eleven knots; the Lackawanna, eight knots; and the Adams, eleven knots. Not one of these vessels could either overtake or run away from the Almirante Cochrane or the Blanco Encalada. The entire squadron is not of sufficient force to compete successfully with even one of these two iron-clads, and not of sufficient speed to avoid a hopeless conflict.

Now, look for a moment to the navy of Chili. The following extract will explain:

THE NAVY OF CHILI.

Name of vessel.	Thickness of armor, in inches.	Displacement, in tons.	Speed, in knots.	Number and description of guns.	Remarks.
Almirante Cochrane	4½ to 9	3,560	12.8	Six 9-inch 12½-ton guns.	Full sail-power.
Blanco Encalada	4½ to 9	3,560	12.8	Six 9-inch 12½-ton guns.	Full sail-power.
Huascar	4½ to 5½	1,100	11	Two 200-pdrs., four 40-pdrs.	Captured from Peru.

Thus it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that any one of Chili's war vessels could run down and destroy the four war vessels which the United States have at that station. It could even continue its course, enter the harbor of San Francisco and put your city of San Fracisco, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. PAGE being in the chair,) under contribution.

From the statistics to which I refer it will be seen that Denmark has more efficient armored ships than the United States. Even Sweden, small as she is, has more efficient war vessels. Norway has 4 monitors and 22 gunboats. Brazil, 18 armored vessels and 52 unarmored vessels. Two of her armored vessels have a maximum thickness of armor of 12 inches and are armed with 10-inch rifle guns. So that it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, any one of the fourth or fifth rate powers could run their war vessels into our exposed cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, and put them under forced contribution. Can any gentleman conceive of a more humiliating condition for this great country to occupy, in so far as the harbor and coast defenses are concerned? One object of the bill under consideration is:

And provided further, That $1,000,000 of the above amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Navy to the following objects, namely: To building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh; to the launching to the best advantage of the iron-clad steamers Monadnock, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror; and to the completion of the engines and machinery of such two of the last-named vessels as he may on examination think most expedient and best for the interests of the service; and that any part of the appropriation for said bureau not used as above specified may be applied toward the construction of engines and machinery of two new cruising vessels provided for by this act.

I am heartily in accord with this provision of the bill, and desire to see these monitors completed, unless there shall be some good reason to the contrary. Has any gentleman any reliable information tending to show that there is such good reason? From all I have heard in this debate, and from what is presented by the various reports, I know of none such. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, it fully appears that there is no such reason, and upon that subject I beg to read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and it will be seen that that report incorporates the views of his predecessor, Hon. R. W. Thompson. It is in the following language:

It would be highly censurable to waste the above sum of $3,528,580.58 by failing to finish the vessels on which it has been deliberately expended, unless some good reason for condemning them is shown. None such exists, and no person favors such condemnation. The Secretary of the Navy, Hon. R. W. Thompson, who had previously arrested work on them, stated in a communication to the House of Representatives of May 20, 1880, the conclusions of various boards carefully appointed by direction of Congress, in a joint resolution of April 2, 1880, to inquire whether it was for the interest of the Government to complete these monitors; and the Secretary then adds:

"The unanimity of opinion in reference to each of these vessels would seem to leave no room for doubt, therefore, that the interest of the Government requires the completion of all of them. In this opinion I concur for two controlling reasons:

"First. That to leave them uncompleted, after so large a sum of money has been expended upon them, would be bad economy, inasmuch as the loss would be very heavy to the Government; and

"Second. Because when completed they would undoubtedly be equal, if not superior, to any other vessels of their class in the world." (House Executive Document 82, part 2, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.)

We owe it to ourselves, Mr. Chairman, as the representatives of the people, we owe it to the country to prepare, and prepare in time, to meet emergencies that may at any moment arise. It is a maxim of political statesmanship "In time of peace to prepare for war." True, there is no pressing emergency just now; but no human foresight can tell when an emergency may arise.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do not think, if my friend from West Virginia will take the trouble to read page 2 of Secretary Thompson's report, that he will publish what he indicates that he will publish.

Recently, sir, when the member from the State of New Jersey concluded his speech in the general debate, he made a Parthian shot, in which he said, as I remember, although it did not appear exactly so quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that during the last five or six years $73,000,000 had been expended by the Democratic party under the leadership of the member from Tennessee, and that they had not built a vessel or put a gun afloat.

Now, that member should have remembered that of the years to which he refers at least twenty months were under his administration as Secretary of the Navy. He should have remembered that he left as a legacy a large deficiency to his successor. He should have remembered that he left to it over $7,000,000 of liability. He should have remembered that he handicapped his successor, Hon. R. W. Thompson, from the State of Indiana, with illegal contracts. He should have told the country that the Democratic party made no expenditure at all; that it was a Republican Secretary of the Navy that made these expenditures; that the Democratic party upon this floor simply in response to the demand of the head of that Department gave him what he asked for the conduct of the Navy. He should have remembered further, or on turning to the official reports of Secretary Thompson he would have found that that Secretary boasted he left the Navy in a more efficient condition than he found it. He should have remembered that when he boasted of thirty-eight cruisers as efficient, that that Secretary of the Navy had expended over $8,000,000 for the purpose of making them efficient.

I desire in that connection to call the attention of the committee to a table I will publish with my remarks, showing all the expenditures of the last five years under Secretary Thompson and Secretary Hunt, and the expenditures of five years immediately preceding under the Secretary of the Navy who hailed from the State of New Jersey, and I will show a difference of $39,495,570.32 expended by that Secretary. Here is the table:

Five years under Thompson and Hunt.		Five years under Robeson.
1881	$15,686,671 66	1876	$18,963,309 82
1880	13,536,984 74	1875	21,497,626 27
1879	15,125,126 84	1874	30,932,587 42
1878	17,365,301 37	1873	23,526,256 79
1877	14,959,935 36	1872	21,249,809 99
	76,674,019 97		116,169,590 29

Or $39,495,570.32 more expended by the Robeson administration in the five years preceding the Thompson administration than was that expended by Hon. R. W. Thompson and Hon. W. H. Hunt in their five years.

We heard on the floor to-day that the United States Navy did not have a ship. That was the statement my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] was referring to a few moments ago when he spoke about there being no navy. I stand, if you please, Mr. Chairman, upon the report made—and from which I quoted, as referred to by Mr. ELLIS—by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts. There is no navy compared with the navies of the world. I repeat that. But, sir, you are now asked to throw more money away.

Mr. WILSON. The Department is carrying out exactly your recommendation.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No, sir. Never have I said I will give a dollar for these iron-clads. I have stood opposing it for the last six years. I have said you might as well throw your money into a rat hole as give it in that direction. They cannot stand against a Chinese gunboat to-day. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCALES obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. WHITTHORNE.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I heard the remark made the other day that nobody but Isherwood and Lenthall had condemned these vessels. Now, William M. Jeffers, late head of the Bureau of Ordnance, one of the most distinguished officers belonging to the United States Navy, says of the Puritan:

She is for the purposes for which she is designed absolutely useless.

Turn to the testimony of Captain Selfridge before the Naval Committee and you will find that when you have built these turrets on these vessels according to their original design you cannot put an efficient gun inside of them.

It cannot be done, even when you have changed them according to the plans recommended by the various boards. I ask you to turn to what Secretary Thompson reports. I cannot read it now, but I ask you, for your own sakes as well as for the sake of the country, to turn to that report. And I stand here and say that the Preble board, the Mullaney board, the Stevens board, and every board that has seen them have recommended material alterations in the plans and designs of these vessels. I say Secretary Thompson said the same thing. And, gentlemen of the Republican party, if you rely on the report submitted by the Appropriations Committee as to what Secretary Thompson recommended you have been misled. Here it is, and I state that Secretary Thompson said that in the completion of these vessels he recommended an alteration in their plan and models. You do not propose to do that in this bill. And there is no board, no officer, not even a mere tyro, that has seen these things but recommends a change in their plans.

Mr. WILSON. Did not Secretary Thompson say that when completed they would be equal if not superior to anything in the world?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. There is his recommendation. [Handing Mr. WILSON the report.] And now, Mr. Chairman, as to the vast expenditure of money on these vessels; after it is demonstrated that they cannot carry an efficient naval gun you are asked by this bill to launch upon a movement that means the expenditure of over $6,000,000. Pause, my dear friends, pause all honest men, pause all reflecting men, before you thus extravagantly waste the public money. I am for a navy, and if you will take the money you are about to expend upon these useless vessels and go to the building of steel cruisers you will find an earnest, warm advocate in myself for it; but this diversion of the public money is extravagant and wasteful.

Mr. SPEER. I cannot hope in anything I will say to rival the vehement and impassioned utterances of my genial and accomplished friend [Mr. WHITTHORNE] who has just concluded. But there is a passage or two from the history of our own country which I think the House should remember at this time. I read, sir, from a British historian an account of the achievements of our small but most efficient Navy in the war with Great Britain in 1812:

> But if the Americans were unsuccessful on one element, they met with extraordinary and unlooked-for triumphs on another, which excited the greater sensation that they shook the general belief which at that time prevailed of British invincibility at sea, and opened up, to the jealousy of other nations at our commercial greatness, hopes of its overthrow at no distant period.

The historian proceeds to give with great reluctance manifestly an account of the combats between the Constitution and the Guerrière, the Frolic and the Wasp, the Macedonian and the United States, the Java and the Constitution, the Hornet and the Peacock, in all of which the Americans were victorious. I quote the accounts he gives of these engagements:

> The Constitution fell in on the 19th August with the Guerrière, Captain Dacres, and a most obstinate action took place. The American frigate was decidedly superior, both in the number and weight of its guns, and the number of its crew; but notwithstanding that disadvantage, Captain Dacres maintained a close fight, yard-arm to yard-arm, for upward of an hour, with his formidable antagonist. At the end of that time, however, his vessel was a perfect wreck, wholly dismasted, rolling about in the trough of a tempestuous sea, incapable of making any further resistance, with seventy-nine men killed and wounded, including among the latter Captain Dacres himself, and thirty shots in the hull below water-mark; while the Constitution had only seven killed and as many wounded. In these circumstances further resistance was evidently hopeless, and the English colors were mournfully lowered to the broad pennant of their emancipated offspring.
> Hardly had the English recovered from the shock of this unwonted naval disaster when other blows of the same description succeeded each other with stunning rapidity. On the night of the 16th October, the Frolic, British sloop of eighteen guns, fell in with the American brig Wasp, of the same number of guns, but considerably superior both in weight of metal, tonnage, and crew. The crew of the Frolic were laboring to repair their rigging, which had been severely damaged the day before in a gale, when the action commenced, and was kept up with equal skill and spirit on both sides. But the rigging of the British ship was in so shattered a condition from the effect of the previous storm that in ten minutes she lay an unmanageable log in the waters, which gave her opponent such an advantage that in twenty minutes more she was compelled to strike.
> But a more serious disaster soon occurred. On the 25th of October the American frigate United States hove in sight of the British frigate Macedonian. As usual on all these occasions, the American vessel was superior by nearly a half, in tonnage, crew, and weight of guns. From the very commencement of the combat, which for some time was at long-shot only, it was evident that the Americans were cutting the British to pieces with comparatively little loss on their side; and when at length the English commander succeeded in engaging the enemy in close fight, which Commodore Decatur, of the United States, willingly joined in, the superiority of the enemy's fire was such that the Macedonian was soon dismasted. She had received nearly a hundred shots in her hull, and her lower tier of guns, owing to the rolling of the vessel in a tempestuous sea, were under water, while a third of her crew were killed or wounded. On the other hand, the American vessel, having no sail which she could not set except her mizzen-topsail, remained perfectly steady. Even in these desperate circumstances, however, the native spirit of British seamen did not desert them. As a last resource an attempt was made to carry the enemy by boarding, and the moment this intention was announced, every man who could move was on deck, several of whom had lost an arm but a few minutes before in the cock-pit; and the universal cry was, "Let us conquer or die." At this moment, however, the fore-brace was shot away, and the yard, swinging round, threw the vessel upon the wind, so that boarding was impossible. The United States then stood athwart the bow of the Macedonian without firing a gun, and passed on out of shot. It was at first supposed she was making off by the British sailors, who loudly cheered. But this was only to refill her cartridges, which had been expended; and soon tacking, she took up a raking position across the stern of her now defenseless antagonist, and soon compelled her to strike her colors. The superiority of the American force, as well as her weight of metal, was then very apparent; for while the Macedonian had thirty-six killed and sixty-eight wounded, the United States had only five killed and seven badly wounded.
> Nor was this the last of the discomfitures which at this period befel the British navy. The Java, forty-six guns, had sailed from Spithead on the 12th of November, with a motley crew of three hundred and ninety-seven persons, nearly one-half of whom were wholly inexperienced; and on the 28th they discharged six broadsides of blank cartridges, being the first that the majority of the crew had ever assisted in firing. Captain Lambert, who commanded her, had warmly remonstrated against this wretched ship complement, declaring that with such people he was not only no match for an American of superior, but hardly for a Frenchman of equal size. But all the answer he got from the admiralty was, that "a voyage to the East Indies and back would make a good crew." Obliged to submit, the English captain set sail, and on the 28th of December fell in with the American frigate Constitution; and, notwithstanding the superior bulk and weight of his antagonist and the wretched condition of his crew, Captain Lambert immediately made up to the enemy, although nineteen of his men were away with a prize he had shortly before made. The Constitution at first stood away under all sail before the wind, to gain the distance at which the American gunnery was so destructive, but finding the British frigate gained upon her she shortened sail, and placing herself under the lee bow of the Java, a close action immediately commenced. The first broadside of the English frigate told with such effect on the American hull that the latter wore to get away; but the skillful Englishman wore also, and a running fight ensued for a considerable time, during which Captain Lambert's superiority of seamanship was very apparent.
> After a desultory engagement of this sort for forty minutes, during which the Java, notwithstanding the superior weight of the enemy's metal, had suffered very little, the two vessels came within pistol shot and a most determined action ensued. Captain Lambert now resolved on boarding, but just as he was making preparations for doing so, the foremast of the Java fell with a tremendous crash breaking in the forecastle and covering the deck, and soon after the main topmast came down also, and to complete their misfortunes, Captain Lambert fell mortally wounded. The command now devolved on Lieutenant Chad, but he found the vessel perfectly unmanageable, and the wreck of the masts falling over on one side, almost every discharge set the vessel on fire. Still the action continued with the most determined resolution, but at length, after it had lasted three hours and a half, the Java was found to be rapidly sinking, while the Constitution had assumed a raking position where every shot told and not a gun could be brought to bear on her. In these desperate circumstances Lieutenant Chad at length struck, and the vessel was so disabled that as soon as the crew were taken out the American captain blew her up. In this desperate and unequal engagement the Java had twenty-two killed and one hundred and two wounded, the Constitution ten killed and forty wounded.
> Another action between smaller vessels, but terminating in the same result, took place on the 14th of February, 1813, between the British sloop Peacock and the American brig Hornet. In this, as in all the previous instances where the Americans had proved successful, the superiority on their side was very decided; but the action which ensued was, nevertheless, of the most bloody and destructive kind. It lasted an hour and a half; at the end of which time the effect of the American's fire was such that the Peacock was found to be in a sinking state. A signal of distress was immediately hoisted, which was answered with praiseworthy humanity by the brave Americans, and every effort was made by the crews of both vessels to save the disabled ship. But notwithstanding all their efforts she went down in a few minutes, with thirteen of her own crew and three of the Hornet's, who were engaged in the noble act of striving to save their enemies.
> No words can convey an adequate idea of the impression which the successive capture of these three frigates and two sloops made, not only in Great Britain and America but over the whole civilized world. The triumphs of the British navy for above a century had been so uninterrupted, and the moral influence the nation had in consequence acquired had become so prodigious that it was generally believed both at home and abroad that they were invincible, and that no other nation had any chance of success in combatting them on the ocean, except with the most decided superiority of force. When, therefore, it was seen that in repeated instances of combats of single vessels of the same class against each other the ships of the United States had proved victorious, the English were stunned as by the shock of an earthquake, the Americans were immeasurably and with good reason elated, and the other nations in Europe thought they discerned at last the small black cloud arising over the ocean which was to involve the British maritime power in destruction. The majority of men in the continental states, ever governed by the event and incapable of just discrimination, took no trouble to inquire whether or not the vessels opposed to each other had been equally matched, but joined in one universal chorus of exultation at the defeat of a nation which had so long been the object of their avowed dread and secret jealousy. And it was generally said, apparently not without reason, that a naval power which with the command only of four frigates and eight sloops had in so short a time achieved such successes might look forward at no distant period, when its navy was enlarged, to wresting from Great Britain the scepter of the ocean.

He then concludes as follows:

> In truth, the succession of disasters, like all calamities which occur in such numbers together as to be obviously beyond the effect of chance, gave much subject for serious reflection, not merely to the heedless multitude, but to reflecting statesmen. It was now painfully evident that the English were not invincible on their favorite element; that foresight in preparation, as well as energy in action, were necessary to sustain their fortunes, and that, if these were neglected, they had no exemption from the common lot of humanity. The few who looked beyond the mere surface of things saw, indeed, to what cause the disasters had been owing. The British Government maintaining a hundred ships of the line, and five hundred smaller vessels actually in commission, and carrying on war at once in every quarter of the globe, could not by possibility man their vessels with the same picked and skilled crews as the Americans, who had merely a few frigates and sloops to fit out from the resources of a great commercial navy. The frigates and brigs of the United States, built with extraordinary skill and in a peculiar manner, to which there was no parallel in the British navy, were at once too swift sailers to be overtaken by ships of the line, and of too heavy metal to be a fair match for frigates nominally of the same class. This peculiarity in the construction of their vessels had been wholly overlooked by the admiralty, who anticipated no danger from so diminutive a marine as that of the United States, though it was well known, and had been the subject of anxious solicitude to better informed individuals in the community.

So it was against a navy of a hundred ships of the line and five hundred smaller vessels in commission, that our small Navy of a few frigates and sloops of war carried our banner gloriously all over the ocean; and the names of Bainbridge, Decatur, Hull, and the other heroes of that war are perpetuated by the efficiency of those few ships.

We do not need a large navy. A few ships, swift, efficient, and adequately manned, will be a terror to the great commercial nations of the earth, and in that way we will be able to protect ourselves most adequately from war with them.

It was for this reason that I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS.] I think this chapter of our history should be read with care by Representatives in the consideration of this question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. While I do not propose to engage in this controversy about the iron-clads, I wish to bear my testimony to the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] He never has advocated the finishing of these iron-clads. He has fought the Puritan with a vindictiveness, if he will allow me to use that word, that could not have been exceeded had the Puritan been the late Secretary of the Navy himself.

But when the gentleman undertakes to say that these ships have been condemned, I ask him to pause and consider whether any man has condemned the hulls of the Puritan, the Monadnock, the Miantonomoh, the Terror, and the Amphitrite? There are no better hulls afloat in the world than those. The men who do not believe that these ships should be finished in the way they were originally designed, still admit that about their hulls.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman allow me? I refer him to Chief Engineer King in his work on the War Ships and Navies of the World, and to Constructor Lenthall.

Mr. COBB, (to Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts.) Are these vessels of iron?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. They are of iron; they are double hulls on the bracket system. And I want to ask my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] if during the whole period he was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs he ever set eyes on either of them? Unfortunately the gentleman who made the report never saw the ships he talks about.

These ships are large, double-bottom, bracket ships, built upon the most approved style. The question has been whether the original design provided for adequate armament and guns. I say no. The world has moved since their keels were laid. To-day the art of iron ship-building is far in advance of what it was at that time; and the art of making armament and getting up ordnance has advanced.

But these ships are good ships, and all we have to do now is to finish them so that they shall be effective. How shall that be done? By putting upon them steel turrets and making them modern ships.

The gentleman from Tennessee says that Mr. Selfridge condemned these ships. I have great respect for Mr. Selfridge, but unfortunately he came into the committee-room on Naval Affairs with the design for a new iron-clad which was his hobby. What did he say about that design? That it was to be a ship of 8,000 tons burden, 3,000 tons more than the Puritan, with engines of six or seven thousand horse-power, and to cost several millions of dollars. He came before the Committee on Naval Affairs and urged that plan for a ship; and when a naval officer has a hobby of his own he is very apt to condemn the hobby of any other person.

Now, what does this bill propose? It proposes to launch these ships; to take them off private hands; to put new turrets and good turrets on the Miantonomoh, and then go on and provide steam machinery for these ships; that is all. And we can do no less than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I have modified my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "provided," in line 421, down to and including "1882," in lines 444 and 445, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That no part of said sum shall be applied to the repair of engines and machinery of wooden ships where the estimated cost of such repair shall exceed 30 per cent. of the estimated cost of new engines and machinery of the same character and power. That $1,000,000 of the above amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Navy to the following objects, namely: To building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh; to the launching to the best advantage of the iron-clad steamers Monadnock, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror; and to the completion of the engines and machinery of said vessels as he may on examination think most expedient and best for the interests of the service. And that any part of the appropriation for said bureau not used as above specified may be applied to the construction of engines and machinery of two new cruising vessels provided for in this act."

Mr. SPEER. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the portion beginning with the words "that $1,000,000," and ending with the word "service."

The Clerk read as follows the portion proposed to be struck out:

That $1,000,000 of the above amount shall be applied by the Secretary of the Navy to the following objects, namely: To building and fitting the turrets and pilot-house of the iron-clad steamer Miantonomoh; to the launching to the best advantage of the iron-clad steamers Monadnock, Puritan, Amphitrite, and Terror; and to the completion of the engines and machinery of said vessels as he may on examination think most expedient and best for the interests of the service.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that my amendment looks to taking out of the bill all provision for completing monitors. I have given as conscientious and careful study to this subject as has been in my power; and the gentleman from Massachusetts will bear me witness that I have co-operated with him in his efforts to secure an effective navy. His contention has been from first to last that whatever money we may expend should be expended for the purpose of getting a navy. The provision for the completion of these monitors looks to the expenditure of $4,300,000 in round numbers upon certain hulls of ships which the gentleman from Massachusetts says are good hulls. That is not the question. The question is whether when the money is expended they will be good ships. If they will not be good ships (and by that I mean such ships as include the latest improvements and are up to the demands of naval warfare) then it is throwing money away to expend $1,000,000, to be followed by three million and a half more, upon these monitors.

I have come to the conclusion that the money will be thrown away; that the ships will, when finished, be worthless; and for a reason which the gentleman from Massachusetts did not give—that these hulls, however good, cannot carry armor sufficient to resist modern ordnance, and that these turrets, however well designed they were for the past, cannot be made sufficient to resist the great guns of this day. In other words, if you put the armor upon these hulls and the turrets upon the decks the vessels will sink to the bottom; I mean the armor and the turrets necessary to resist the modern ten, twelve, and fifteen inch guns.

Now, it is a question of fact that I submit to this House. I am prepared to say it is a fact that when you have put on the steel-faced armor and the turrets recommended by the last board these vessels will still be totally inadequate to resist the modern ten and twelve inch guns such as are mounted on the Ajax and the Agamemnon. The figures upon these points were included in my remarks the other day—that portion which I was too unwell to deliver. They will be found in the RECORD of June 30. I then said:

The comparative resistance of these two belts of armor—

That is the armor on the Ajax and Agamemnon, as compared with that on the corresponding armored vessel, the Miantonomoh—may safely be stated as three to one in favor of the Ajax and Agamemnon.

Think of that. At this day when we are called upon by every consideration of patriotism to produce good vessels we deliberately go to work and build a vessel which has only one-third of the resisting power of the Ajax or the Agamemnon.

The turrets of the Miantonomoh are not yet definitely designed; they cannot exceed 10 inches in thickness of compound armor, for she could not carry thicker in addition to the other weights still to be placed on board.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Whose opinion is the gentleman quoting?

Mr. HEWITT of New York. I am giving the results of the examination of the board that sat upon the Miantonomoh, the board which recommended the placing of 10-inch armor upon her and figured up what would be the strength of the vessel when thus armored.

The thickness of solid armor of the English turret is 16 inches, composed of 10½ inches of iron faced with 5½ inches of steel and termed compound armor.

You propose to put 10-inch armor on the Miantonomoh. One of these English ships could come right alongside of her and overthrow her turret—knock it all to pieces with one shot.

The resistance of the turrets of the Ajax and Agamemnon will be nearly double that of the Miantonomoh. Guns will project from the turrets.

This brings us to another consideration. The Miantonomoh is recommended to be armed with 10-inch breech-loading rifles. Ten inch guns must be 26 calibers long. They must project at least five feet permanently from the turret, which is limited by the dimensions of the vessel to 22 feet.

Mr. BERRY. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the gentleman renews it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do.

The guns must project permanently from the turrets of the Miantonomoh. When she goes into action the guns are openly exposed to every shock of the enemy. The old, recognized, and proper method is, of course, to be able to withdraw the guns inside the turret after they are fired. That cannot be done in the case of any one of these ships.

The guns of the Miantonomoh are not yet built. And here I want to say another word about guns. The reason why neither these ships nor the ships we have to-day provided should be begun is this: we cannot build a steel breech-loading gun in the United States. I mean we cannot, by any possibility, go beyond a 6-inch gun. The largest hammer in this country will forge a piece of steel adequate for a 6-inch gun and no more. What are you going to do? Build ships and leave this country dependent on foreign nations for guns? How are you going to get them in time of war? You cannot get your first 10-inch gun, if you started to-morrow, under three years. You have to build a hundred-ton steam-hammer, which will cost $1,000,000, and will require two years to build, if the money was in the pocket of the contractor to-day.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think this country should have 10-inch steel rifles?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; beyond any doubt.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Has he any doubt, if this country would let the manufacturers of guns have an opportunity to build them, they will build them here as well as they build them in foreign countries?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I want to give them an opportunity and it is the first thing that ought to be done. And if the Committee on Appropriations had apprehended the necessities of this country and been willing to take, as they have taken, the responsibility of building a navy, they should have brought in a measure by which a hundred-ton steam-hammer should be secured by the Government or some contractor. That is my answer to the gentleman. And he knows as well as I do, for he has reported over and over again, the steam-hammer is the fundamental basis on which steel guns rest.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman had consented that the bill of the Naval Committee should be considered in this Congress he would have found that we provided for the purchase in this country of nearly one hundred steel guns in the bill itself, and made an appropriation for them.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I will guarantee if you will give the gun manufacturers a contract for fifty guns they will provide the machinery with which to make them.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes; and it will require three years to produce the first gun for the Miantonomoh whose turrets you are asking to finish in the next six months. What is it to do when it is finished? Lie idle waiting for guns for two and a half years? I say to the gentlemen they are beginning at the wrong end.

I wish to add that the Miantonomoh is not capable of carrying a 10-inch steel gun. Until you can appropriate the money to secure vessels to carry 6 and 10 inch guns you are throwing money away. Now, then, differently expressed, the Miantonomoh's guns will not penetrate the Ajax's armor at any point whatever. If you throw the two ships alongside of each other, finish the Miantonomoh, put the 10-inch gun on her, and lash her alongside the Ajax and fire it off, it could not penetrate the turret of the Ajax, while the Ajax gun will go right through the Miantonomoh's armor—in on one side and out the other—and penetrate the turret.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Who said that?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I say it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. That is exactly what I want to know.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will give the gentleman the authority. I say it from the official figures and the report made to me by the Navy Department as to the penetrating power of her guns, and from the testimony taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts before the Naval Committee, and which I have on my desk. I have had the figures given by his own witnesses in making the computation.

Further testimony is to be found in the opinion of Chief Engineer King, who says finally, in comparing the Miantonomoh with the Glatton:

> The advantages possessed by the Miantonomoh over the last two named vessels are lighter draught and a greater number of guns. The disadvantage is an armor too thin for protection against heavy modern projectiles.

Now you are going to finish the monitors when every respectable authority, at least so far as I have ever heard, deems them to be worthless.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, four boards constituted by the Navy Department have pronounced in favor of these monitors. Two Naval Committees have visited the monitors, and these have also pronounced in their favor. The Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a searching communication sent to him by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, says that "no person questions the propriety of their completion;" and I have taken pains to inquire what he means by "no person." He stated that after the examination of every report he finds they are recommended by every officer that has examined them with the exception of Mr. Lenthall. He says that he called his bureau officers together when he received that letter, and every one of them recommended that they should be finished. He said that he sent for Admiral Porter, and said to him, "What do you say about these iron-clads?" His reply was: "Why, they must be finished, of course. Nobody says I have said they should not be finished."

I do not know whether that is the last utterance of that distinguished naval authority or not, but at all events it is his last official utterance. Now, we have been told for the last five years that these ships would not float on the same authority that the gentleman from New York rests upon to-day and which I suppose prepared his memoranda. We have been told by that same authority, in the face of the combined views of all the experts of the country, that these ships would sink if they were launched. One of them has been launched, and she did not sink. One would have thought that demonstration would have been sufficient to stop that line of criticism. Time was, Mr. Chairman, "that when the brains were out the man was dead; but now they rise and seek to push us from our very stools." In the very face of the fact which stares every man who looks, or who will go to the navy-yard at Philadelphia where the Miantonomoh floats six inches above what she was calculated to float, this statement is repeated. She rests there ready to carry forty-ton guns to-day, the same size as the guns of the Ajax, and her displacement will warrant it. There she floats, and we ask only to put on her turrets with ten inches of iron faced with steel, which would give us the same thickness of armor that the Ajax carries.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman will pardon me. I think——

Mr. ROBESON. I may not have given the figures exactly, but the turrets of this vessel, as now contemplated, are the same which are now on the unfinished English ship Ajax. The Ajax draws twenty-four feet of water—twenty-five feet when loaded. The Miantonomoh draws about fourteen feet, I believe. The Ajax will be effective for a short distance only, being confined to the deep waters of Europe. It is necessary for our harbors and the protection of our coast line that we should have monitors of light draught; and the great problem presented to naval constructors was to secure such light-draught monitors with sufficient speed and capable of bearing armor of sufficient resistance for our purposes. This has been accomplished by the construction of the monitors now under consideration.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that these monitors are not effective. Let me call the attention of the committee for a moment to a comparison. The United States steamer Miantonomoh is two hundred and fifty feet long. The twin iron-clads of the same class of England are such ships as the Cyclops. She is 225 feet long. The Miantonomoh has a breadth of 55 feet and 6 inches, the Cyclops of 45 feet; the Miantonomoh has a draught of 14 feet and 2 inches, the Cyclops has 15 feet and 6 inches; the displacement of the Miantonomoh is 3,815, that of the Cyclops 3,430. The maximum speed of the Miantonomoh is twelve knots an hour, the maximum speed of the Cyclops is from ten to eleven knots an hour. The number of turrets on the Miantonomoh is two, that of the Cyclops is two. The number of guns is four on each. The steel armor of the Miantonomoh is seven inches in thickness, that of the Cyclops from five to seven inches. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON took the floor and yielded to Mr. ROBESON.

Mr. ROBESON. Now I will compare briefly another class of vessels. The Glatton is another class which approaches the Miantonomoh. The Miantonomoh has a speed of twelve knots against nine and ten knots of the vessels of the class of the Glatton. She carries twice as many guns as the others. She has twice the power of resistance in her armor.

But there is included in these another vessel, the Puritan, which will be vastly superior to any of those which are named by the gentleman, a vessel which is to have a single turret and one 14-ton gun, the same that is carried by the Inflexible and the Devastation. Now, let us see the advantages: we have a ship here which is to have fourteen knots' speed against twelve and thirteen knots' speed; a ship that is equal to any ship in the world, and far superior to any ships which can enter our harbors.

You must remember that these great English iron-clads draw twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, and twenty-eight feet of water. There is no harbor on our coast, except that of Portland, Maine, which carries twenty-eight feet of water over its bar; and a vessel drawing that much can go over the bar in that harbor only with skillful pilots. New York will not carry ordinarily more than twenty-five feet of water over its bar; Philadelphia not quite so much, Baltimore not so much, Charleston not so much, New Orleans not so much, and then only under the direction and management of skillful pilots.

Mr. BERRY. How about San Francisco?

Mr. ROBESON. San Francisco has deep water in its harbor and needs to be protected. Let me say in regard to San Francisco that the channel through the gate is thirty feet deep, but the stream there runs like a mill race, and torpedoes will not avail there because they cannot be surely anchored.

What you must have for the defense of San Francisco is an iron-clad such as is now designed and half built on the California coast, to lie in the pathway of invasion, and to present a resistance to any country, responsible or irresponsible, which may dare to flaunt its flag in the face of American honor. With the Monadnock there, assisted by the Camanche which is already there, a small but slow single-turreted monitor, with the assistance of swift torpedo-boats that can rush out and ply their deadly weapons directly against an enemy, you will have an adequate protection.

But you will not have protection if the policy of the gentleman New York [Mr. HEWITT] and the members here who follow him shall be pursued. You will not have protection if we are to wait three years for guns, and then three years to finish the ships, and then three years for something else, until some new change shall be designed.

If it is going to take all this time to protect ourselves, in God's name let us stop this debate and begin to-day. Why delay a moment longer?

We ask nothing in this bill except to finish the turrets for the Miantonomoh, an iron-clad which is finished all but her turrets, and to launch the other ships which are now in the private yards of their manufacturers. When they are launched, if they sink, then the question is solved, and Mr. Isherwood and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] will be right. But if they float, then they will be wrong upon that point.

What else do we ask? To finish the engines of these ships, which it will take more than a year to complete. When they are done, if these ships shall have been proved not to be good, they can go into other ships, for they will be just as effective in other ships as in these.

We ask that we shall go on with this work now, because this is a work which it will take time to perform. We propose nothing in the way of armament, nothing for the hulls of these ships, except to launch them, leaving the lapse of time and the increase of knowledge and the progress of science to determine when the engines are done what shall be done in the way of the armament of the ships.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. McCOOK. I move to strike out the last word. A moment ago, when the Committee of the Whole adopted the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] we inaugurated a policy that will result, as at all events I hope, in creating a navy worthy the name and worthy the traditions of the American nation.

I hope to live to see the day when the Navy of the United States will be equal to that which carried Decatur and Hull and Bainbridge, to whom the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] referred.

But the question now presents itself (and it seems to me it is a simple and plain question) whether the policy which we inaugurated a few moments since of constructing large vessels of steel, with enormous power, sufficient to prey upon the commerce of the enemy, is to be perverted—if I may use that expression—by constructing monitors which it is notoriously the fact are not sea-going, or, if sea-going, cannot remain at sea for any length of time?

Early in this session, when the fortification appropriation bill was before the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] developed his policy by opposing any increase in the appropriations for the construction of the fortifications of the country, and suggested at the time that the country would have to rely upon the Navy for the defense of its harbors.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to put my military opinion against that of the gentleman from New Jersey in regard to the method of defending the harbors of this country; but I will refer him to men who have written scientifically upon this subject, and whose opinion is uniform that the defense of the harbors of this country must depend upon fortifications, upon torpedoes, upon rams of tremendous power, and upon torpedo boats.

Now, if the gentleman from New Jersey can satisfy me that any one of these proposed monitors will fulfill the conditions either of a ram of enormous power, or a torpedo boat sufficient to attack an iron-clad, I will vote for the appropriation. But until he can do this it seems to me it is practically a waste of money to expend $4,000,000 in addition to what these vessels have already cost—a sufficient amount of money to build at least three or four of these large-class cruisers—for the purpose of entering upon the policy of restoring to our Navy a lot of iron-clad vessels, necessarily sea-coast vessels, that have never been able, so far as I understand, to keep the sea for any length of time.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. One word further, and I shall close all that I have to say on this question. No one has said that the Miantonomoh and her sister ships would sink when launched. Every expert, however, who has examined the Puritan has said she would sink when launched, if completed according to her original design.

Again, no board has ever said in regard to the Miantonomoh, the Terror, the Amphitrite, the Puritan, and the Monadnock, "finish them according to the original plans." On the contrary, every board that has examined these vessels has recommended important modifications and changes.

Now, here is an existing issue of fact. I beg leave to quote from Secretary Thompson's report, Executive Document 82, part 2, Forty-sixth Congress, second session:

The board which examined the Puritan says:

"That it is not to the interest of the Government to complete her wholly according with existing plans, models, and agreements."

That which examined the Amphitrite and Terror says:

"That it is not to the interest of the Government to complete these vessels according to the existing plans, but that changes specified below should be made to increase their safety and qualities of attack and defense."

And that which examined the Monadnock suggests certain modifications of the existing plans and models.

It appears, therefore—

that, according to the opinions of these boards, it is desirable, if these vessels are completed, that the work upon each of them should be done upon plans and models differing somewhat from those originally contemplated. These conclusions are attributable to the fact that since these original plans were designed repeated experiments made in Europe at immense cost have demonstrated the necessity of changes in the construction of vessels, varying them from those of the old type, and thereby greatly increasing their efficiency both for attack and defense.

I appeal to gentlemen who favor this provision to put upon it an amendment in accordance with the official report of the board that has examined this matter.

In reply to an inquiry of a gentleman beside me, I will say that the original design of these vessels (I may be mistaken) was that they should have a speed of twelve knots an hour, but in fact they will not make ten.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCCOOK.] He says that none of these vessels will be sea-going vessels. I want to remind him that the old Miantonomoh, after she had performed service in the American Navy for some years, made the voyage from New York to San Francisco successfully, while her convoy was obliged to put into port, the Miantonomoh thus proving the better ship of the two. The wooden Miantonomoh made the voyage from the United States to Russia and back, and when she returned to the United States she was broken up. The Miantonomoh of to-day is as far superior to the Miantonomoh of that period as it is possible to conceive.

Mr. MCCOOK. I said that these were not vessels which could keep the sea. That I still insist on. I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts will not pretend to tell the committee that any iron-clad ever built in this country is a sea-going vessel in the sense that a war-cruiser is.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. No man has ever claimed, I trust—I certainly never have—that the single or double turreted monitors were to be considered as cruising ships. While the Miantonomoh, the Monadnock, the Terror, the Amphitrite, and the Puritan might all make long sea voyages, that is not their office. They are intended to protect our harbors and our sea coast. When you talk about sea-going iron-clads you must remember you talk about $5,000,000 to a ship. They are to be armed with 7 and 10 inch guns, and rifles at that. If these are completed on the best plans they will be good vessels for the defense of our harbors and sea-coast against any ships with which foreign powers can come against us.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman believe that the turrets of the Miantonomoh can be made to carry a 10-inch rifle gun?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I do not undertake to settle that question, but I do undertake to say, inasmuch as an iron-clad fires her guns through her port-hole on each side and then turns from the enemy in a fight until she is prepared to fire that side again, it is not necessary those guns should be wholly in the turrets, and the hull of European ships are not built on that plan.

Now, gentlemen come here and say she cannot meet the Ajax and she can meet the Agamemnon and she can meet some eight or ten ships in the world. Suppose I were to admit it. Three-fourths of the iron-clad fleet of England cannot stand before either of these ships when properly armed. Two-thirds of the iron-clad fleet of France would be whipped by either of these vessels in a fair fight. So, if we are not building the biggest iron-clads in the world to meet the other biggest iron-clads in the world, we are building some which will meet most of the iron-clads belonging to the great powers of Europe. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBESON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. ROBESON. I renew it.

Mr. KASSON. Let me ask a question for information. A statement was made by the gentleman from Tennessee that the object of the proposition was to finish these vessels according to the original plan, and read authorities to show that should not be done. I wish to inquire if there is anything in the bill looking to the completion of these vessels according to the original plan?

Mr. ROBESON. There is nothing in the bill which looks to the completion of the hulls at all in any way or shape.

As to the question of armor, which is the only thing the reports are against, it was upon these ships before steel armor was contemplated. They recommended steel armor. Everybody agrees it should be put on. Their modification is that of armor. The other alterations are simply alterations recommended with regard to bulk-heads, quarters, &c., and, in the Puritan, do not amount to $12,000 all told. It is a mere matter of arrangement.

We are not going into the question of how these ships shall be armored or how the hulls shall be finished. We are going into the question of turrets on one which is finished, and putting engines in the others, and launching those half done now occupying places in ship-yards.

Now, these are not the most powerful monitors in the world. I admit that; but they are powerful enough to meet and overthrow any monitor which can cross the seas and enter one of our important ports. I will say to the gentleman from New York they are rams also, the Puritan, being a ram of great power, the most powerful perhaps in the world. I will say to him also the defense of the harbor of New York, for instance, cannot exist alone in land fortifications. I admit mere naval defense is not enough; I admit that. I think his forts should be armed with the heaviest ordnance known to the world, and when the War Department adopts any plan on that point the gentleman will find me, as I told him before, with him.

Mr. MCCOOK. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. MCCOOK. And yet the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman from New Jersey is a member, appropriated only $500,000 for all these necessities.

Mr. ROBESON. Because the War Department told us they were not ready to go into it, that they had a board examining the subject and wanted us to wait with our appropriations until it was done.

I say to the gentleman these are sea-going ships, and the Miantonomoh or Puritan can steam to any harbor on the Atlantic coast in Europe or Africa. The Miantonomoh, with the coal she can carry, can steam along our coast.

I say it would be a gross folly, particularly for those gentlemen who represent great monetary interests concentrated in cities, to adopt and vote for appropriations for offensive policy in the Navy, to vote for cruisers to go out on the seas and attack the commerce of the enemy and have nothing to protect the concentrated wealth gathered on the shores of our harbors and in cities resting on the banks of navigable rivers. It would be the worst folly for the American people to invite attack by sending forth fleet cruisers against the commerce of the enemy and yet have no protection at home.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment by unanimous consent is withdrawn, and the amendment recurs on the amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 68.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts:

Add to the amendment these words:

"Provided, however, That the work to be done on the said iron-clad vessels respectively shall be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, by and under contracts let to the lowest responsible bidder, after due advertisement for proposals, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; but advertisements inviting such proposals shall be published in newspapers of general circulation in at least three cities of the United States, and for not less than sixty days. And the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe the terms of the contracts which shall be made, the security to be given, and all regulations and supervision necessary to secure the full performance of such contracts and the proper completion of such work."

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to say but a word in behalf of this proposition. As I understand it, the work upon these five iron-clads, so far as it has progressed, has been done under contracts made without competition, and these vessels, in an unfinished condition, are now in private ship-yards. I have before me a statement, made by a gentleman of experience in the construction of iron vessels, as to the cost of the completion of these iron-clads, or a part of them, under the contracts of March 3, 1877, in comparison with what the cost would be under the contracts which can be made at this time, and suggesting at the same time that it was possible that the contracts of March 3, 1877, might be revived by this bill. He further suggests that the four vessels, the Terror, Amphitrite, Monadnock, and Puritan, could now be completed for $1,382,627.17 less than the sum which was to be paid for their completion under the contracts of March 3, 1877.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. There is no possible objection, so far as I know, with regard to the turrets. But of course with reference to the launching of the ships, as they are already in the private ship-yards or in the yards of constructors, that cannot be done. In regard to the contracts for the engines and boilers I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that they are already under contract, and will be furnished much cheaper than they could be contracted for now. They are under contracts which have all of the safeguards and stipulations which the gentleman mentions, and are guarded just as he proposes to guard these, so far as I understand it.

Mr. HOLMAN. When were these contracts made?

Mr. ROBESON. In 1875 or 1876, I think, although I am not able to give the exact date from memory.

Mr. HOLMAN. In 1875 or 1876?

Mr. ROBESON. And when work and material were much cheaper than they are now. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment if the gentleman will put in it the words "where they are not now under contract."

Mr. HOLMAN. But it is claimed that the work can be done now at a much cheaper rate, that if done by contract made at this time under competition a saving on the old contracts of March 3, 1877, of over a million of dollars would be made to the Government. If this be true, I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will consider it.

If these contracts of March 3, 1877, are binding on the Government, I concede we cannot let the same contracts to anybody else. But that is a matter to be determined.

Mr. ROBESON. There are but five or six ship-building yards in the United States, and each one of these has a contract now for one of these monitors. I do not believe you can get a contract for anything like what you now have.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understand correctly, the contracts now in existence were made, as I have stated, on the 3d of March, 1877.

Mr. ROBESON. I think they were made before that date.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the building of the machinery of the vessels, for I presume those contracts only embrace the machinery and boilers?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it is proposed to give effect to these contracts by this legislation; that is, they are proposed to be the contracts under which the machinery is to be constructed?

Mr. ROBESON. Nobody has yet found fault with these contracts. Every board reported that they are right. They report that the engines are right, and nobody found any fault with them, not even those who have been able to find fault with the armor and the ships themselves.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is asserted that these contracts were made on the 3d day of March, 1877, and not prior to that time.

Mr. ROBESON. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have a statement here from the late Secretary of the Navy, showing that the contracts were made on March 3, 1877, for the completion of the iron-clad monitors Puritan, Monadnock, Amphitrite, and Terror, amounting to $2,103,642. At that time there was no money available in payment of the contracts, and a provision was inserted in the contracts that no payment should be made until an appropriation available for the purpose was made by Congress. This is the statement of the Secretary of the Navy on the 30th of November, 1877.

Now, the point is this: it will be seen very clearly that if these contracts are valid, when this appropriation is made they at once go into effect; in other words, you give effect to the contracts by providing the money to carry them into execution. I hope the gentleman will explain this, and if it is true that they are favorable contracts and are binding contracts, then of course let them continue.

But I hold in my hand the statement of Mr. Nathaniel McKay, a leading ship-builder, showing that these contracts are greatly too high. I have already referred to it. He shows item by item that new contracts can now be made for the completion of the four vessels named, saving $1,382,627.17 on the contracts of March 3, 1877. Referring to the report of the Secretary of the Navy made on the 3d of March, 1877, it is clear the contracts were made on the 3d of March, 1877.

The statement of Mr. Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, is as follows:

There were contracts made by the Department March 3, 1877, for work to be done by this bureau for the completion and fitting the iron-clads Puritan, Monadnock, Amphitrite, and Terror, amounting to $2,103,642. There being at that time no money available in payment of these contracts a provision was inserted in them that no payments should be made under them until appropriations applicable to the purpose were made by Congress. I deemed it my duty also to suspend these contracts, inasmuch as I regarded them as not authorized by law, and to submit to Congress to decide whether they shall be recognized or canceled, and if these vessels are to be completed in what manner it shall be done.

I insist that if these vessels are to be completed the work shall be done under contracts openly made with fair competition.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 6676) to more effectually punish house-breaking in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4166) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GARLAND, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. HOAR to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, The Secretary of the Navy shall not expend any portion of the money hereby appropriated for the completion of the monitors until detailed plans and specifications of the work to be done shall have been carefully made by the board of advice and survey hereby created: And provided further, That he shall advertise the same for open competition and shall award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder in each case; and the contractor shall have the right to do the work in any United States navy-yard suitable for the purpose, or elsewhere, at his option. And nothing herein contained shall be construed to recognize the validity of the alleged contracts of March 3, 1877, in relation to the said monitors or to admit any claim for damages for the use and occupation of space in ship-yards for delay or for any other cause whatever.

Mr. ROBESON. That amendment, Mr. Chairman, if I can see its scope and purport, is to allow any bummer that comes and chooses to bid without plant, without establishment, without responsibility, to compete for this work and build the ships in the United States navy-yards.

These ships can only be built by the great ship-builders of the country. If we are to have good ships we must have them built by them. If that is not your object, then you can leave them to your Mackays and any other adventurers you choose who want to come in and make money under some proposition such as this.

There is no navy-yard in the United States to-day that can build one of those ships. The Boston navy-yards may be able to roll some of the plates and some of the iron, but there is no navy-yard where a ship of that kind can be built.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The object of this amendment is not the encouragement of bummers. That day in the Navy Department I trust is gone by. The object is to give out this work to free competition, to responsible bidders. I will ask the Clerk to add, after the words "the lowest responsible bidder in each case," the words "and such contractor shall give security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy."

The gentleman says that all the yards in this country that could complete these monitors have got a monitor. Well, they are pretty well subsidized. But I am told by the gentleman from Massachusetts that these vessels are ready to be launched. Therefore, when we take them out of the yards——

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to correct that statement? It will cost to launch them $50,000 for the Puritan and $25,000 for each of the others.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. They are ready to be launched, and when launched they can be taken to a navy-yard to be completed, and the contractor, whoever he may be, can get his iron plates and bolts and his armor from where he will. What he wants is a place to do the work, and the amendment allows this to be done in these idle yards that the gentleman proposes to close up. I want to put them to some use; and I want free competition. And I say now, if the contracts made on the 3d of March, 1877, are on more favorable terms even than the bids put in now, it would not be for the interest of this country to allow work to be completed on contracts made, as those contracts were, without advertisement, without competition, on a mere bureau order. We have some higher duties than even to save dollars. We want to give a fair and open competition to every man who can build engines in this country. And I say all the engine builders of this country are not comprised in the five yards the gentleman speaks of. There are a dozen or twenty large establishments outside of them that can build steam-engines in this country adequate for these ships, and we want these large establishments to have a fair chance of competition. I have no doubt, notwithstanding the assertion of the gentleman from New Jersey, it will result in a saving of money and not a loss of money to the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask that it be again read.

The Clerk again read the proposed substitute.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire very briefly to oppose the amendment, and especially two features of it. It has been asserted here that contracts have already been made for this work, and that the economy and cheapness of those contracts have never been questioned. If those contracts are valid contracts and are binding upon the Government, I am opposed to any legislation here which repudiates that obligation. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that we can afford to repudiate a legal obligation against the Government if there is such an obligation, and render the Government liable to such damages as it would be liable to for such repudiation.

I am opposed to the amendment for another reason. I am opposed to turning over the navy-yards of the Government to any contractor, I do not care who he is. This proposition gives to the contractor, to any person who may have got the contract, the right to take possession of a Government navy-yard and control it. We are to turn over and surrender to the successful bidder, whoever he may be, the Government works. I am opposed to any such application as that of the navy-yards.

And I may say that to a certain extent that provision is in direct conflict with certain other provisions of the bill looking to some extent to the closing of certain navy-yards. There is, in my judgment, no propriety, whether the Government requires a navy-yard or not, in allowing a contractor to take possession of one, as he would be enabled to do under this amendment.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to ask the author of this amendment a question or two. I desire to know whether he means by the words "or elsewhere" that the contractors may do this work out of the country?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I do not mean that.

Mr. CONVERSE. Is not the language such that any one living out of the country might bid for this work and take it to be done out of the country?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. To avoid any misconception I will add the words "in the United States."

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who has this matter in charge whether these contracts that are to be carried out if this bill shall pass embrace the contract with William Cramp & Sons, of Philadelphia?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is one of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York says that is one of them. I want to call the attention of this committee to the fact that that firm made a contract with a man of the name of J. W. Fralick for the purpose of securing legislation in reference to confirming that contract. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Copy.] Memorandum of an agreement made this 24th day of March, A. D. 1878, between William Cramp, Sons & Company, of the city of Philadelphia, of the first part, and John W. Fralick, of the second part, of said city, with party of the first part, agree to pay the party of the second part the sum of 5 per cent. for services rendered and to be rendered in securing special instructions from the Navy Department favorable to securing an additional appropriation from Congress in the further construction and completion of the "monitor" now on our docks; and further, this contract to hold good and in force on any similar transaction between J. W. Fralick, of the first part, and W. Cramp, Sons & Company, of the second part, as heretofore mentioned, and the United States Government.

CHAS. H. CRAMP,
For WM. CRAMP & SONS,
S. & E. B. Co.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman with whom this contract was made, Mr. Fralick, sued Cramp & Sons, of the city of Philadelphia, for the purpose of recovering under the contract, and they compromised by paying him $1,000. He testified to the facts and produced this contract in evidence in the case. It appears, therefore, that this contract was made by a company who it is now claimed should be allowed to carry out their contract with the Government, although that company had made a contract with this Fralick for the purpose of procuring a favorable recommendation from the Secretary of the Navy in reference to this very work. We are now asked to appropriate money to carry out a contract where the parties having the benefit of it have endeavored to corruptly influence one of the Departments of the Government.

Mr. KELLEY. I happen to know something about this alleged transaction. The man alluded to, whose name is Fralick, had obtained contracts, from a number of manufacturers and ship-builders of Philadelphia to get contracts for them in some of the South American states, which he was about to visit. He went down there, but obtained no contracts that I know of; though there may have been some unimportant ones.

After his return to this country he presented to the Messrs. Cramp a paper like that which has been read—possibly this is a copy of it—and on its presentation the firm disavowed it; no member of the firm had had any transaction with him on any such matter as it set forth. One member of the firm had signed what he supposed was a contract, together with other Philadelphia manufacturers, for work to be obtained for them. They made his claim known to me, and I went at once to the Navy Department and to the Executive Chamber and laid the transaction before the then Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will my friend yield a moment right there, because I think it is necessary?

Mr. KELLEY. I will hear the gentleman, for he knows something about this matter.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to make this statement, because I think it is due to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] whose name has been connected with the publication made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not connect it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I say that it has been connected with that publication. During the last Congress some information came to me of the character that is now appearing in the public prints. Just about that time there was a pending proposition to complete these monitors.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was talking to me upon the subject. The day after having himself mentioned the matter to me, he came to me and said, "I have certain information, or an intimation, that there has been something improper about these monitors, and I beg to say to you that I am making inquiries, and if I ascertain that there is anything improper about them I will wash my hands entirely of the matter." The gentleman made that statement to me without any knowledge whatever that I had any information in regard to it. Before I disclosed it to him he stated to me that he intended to call upon the President and the Secretary of the Navy and ascertain the truth of the matter and would report to me.

I then said to him, "I have information of this kind;" and then I told him what it was. The day afterward the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. KELLEY] told me that he had called upon the President and upon the Secretary of the Navy, and that one of the Cramps had been telegraphed for. I felt that it was due to the gentleman that I should make this statement.

Mr. KELLEY. To resume. Mr. William H. Cramp came to me, as I have stated, disavowing any such contract, any agreement to make any such payment on account of Government work. He said that the Baldwin Locomotive Works, William Sellers & Co., machine manufacturers, and others, had given this man contracts, or had entered into an agreement to pay him a commission to obtain for them South American contracts, and that their firm had given him such a contract.

I went to the Secretary of the Navy and laid the matter before him. He said that he had never seen or heard of Fralick, and that it was evidently an attempt to black-mail the Cramps. I went to the President also, whose official note-paper and whose envelopes, with the executive stamp, Fralick had used, and I laid the matter before him. He, too, denounced the man as an impostor, and said that he would appear in court as a witness or do anything he could if the scamp should attempt to enforce his claim.

I called the attention of the President to the fact that this man's black-mailing letters were on the executive note-paper, were dated at the Executive Mansion, and were mailed in envelopes bearing the executive stamp; that Fralick was a friend of the President's private secretary, Mr. Rogers, and that his honor and the good name of his closing administration required him to take action in the matter. Soon after this, through the influence of Mr. Rogers, impelled by the President, Fralick surrendered the fraudulent paper, which is now produced as a contract between him and the Cramps to pay for Fralick's influence with the executive department of the United States.

I thank the gentleman from Illinois for having thus brought this paper to public attention; and I thank the gentleman from Tennessee for coming forward promptly, as he has done, to say that while on behalf of this family of constituents of mine, these men who have honored the name of my city and our country by their skill as naval architects and ship-builders, I was urging upon him, as chairman of the Naval Committee, the completion of the Terror and the release of their ship-yard from the incumbrance of this vessel, I heard a whisper of this thing and hastened to tell him that I had heard it; that I proposed to investigate it, and that meanwhile he should consider me as indifferent to the matter; that I brought to him not only the testimony of the Cramps, one of them in person, but the action of the Secretary of the Navy and the President of the United States, showing that the whole scheme was a black-mailing one upon the Cramps. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state——

Mr. KELLEY. I will do so in the gentleman's time if he has any.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has given this firm a good name; but does he deny——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I renew it, and yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has given this firm a very good name. I am not acquainted with them; I am very glad to have his indorsement of them; but——

Mr. KELLEY. I am acquainted with them. From my early childhood I knew the venerable man, recently deceased, who founded the great house that has built for Russia some of her finest iron war ships.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman state that this contract was not signed by a member of that firm in behalf of the firm?

Mr. KELLEY. I do say that that contract was not signed; that the paper the gentleman supposed he was putting his name to was a duplicate of the contracts signed by other manufacturing firms to give this man a commission for contracts he might obtain on private account.

Mr. SPRINGER. He did put his name then to this paper.

Mr. KELLEY. He put his name to a paper; but he says he has no recollection (and he is an honorable man) of any feature of that paper. He is ready to declare upon oath that he believed he was signing, as seventeen or twenty Philadelphia firms did, a contract to send an agent to seek foreign contracts. Now, I will ask you, sir, [addressing Mr. SPRINGER,] whether you believe Fralick, the man who presents——

Mr. SPRINGER. He is one of your constituents; I do not know anything about him.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, I will tell you, sir, that the penitentiary is in my district, and it contains, in my judgment, many better men than Fralick.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should presume so, from the character of the contract he made with one of your constituents.

Mr. KELLEY. He made no such contract.

Mr. SPRINGER. He says he did.

Mr. KELLEY. Aye, the perjured scoundrel upon whom you rely, and who tried to blast the fame of an honest firm, says that he did.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rely upon nothing except the fact that this firm did pay this man a thousand dollars on their contract.

Mr. KELLEY. They may have paid him a thousand dollars, as did other manufacturers in Philadelphia, on account of the expenses he said he had incurred in going to South America.

Mr. SPRINGER. Fralick is the agent of the firm; he is not my constituent, nor my friend. I do not know him.

Mr. KELLEY. He is your constituent on this occasion.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. It is upon his word you are assailing the character of one of the most honorable of our Philadelphia firms, and in this matter he is your sole constituent.

Mr. SPRINGER. He was the agent of the firm; you acknowledge it. You have stated that they paid him $1,000 for important services with foreign governments.

Mr. KELLEY. No; I have not said "with foreign governments," but for trying to get them contracts in foreign countries.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well. But this firm that was competent to build ships for Russia and to found one of the great houses of Philadelphia seems to have signed a contract without knowing what it contained and to have employed a man who, as the honorable gentleman says, (and I take his word for it,) ought to have been in the penitentiary instead of transacting important business with foreign governments.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank God I stand by men whose reputation is known, and the gentleman opposes me on the interested allegation of a man who defrauds the criminal law of the land so long as he remains outside the bars of a penitentiary. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. He is the man who was employed to do the dirty work. He is not the kind of man with whom the Government should make a contract. I am not here to indorse him. I denounce him and his contract and everybody else who had anything to do with it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the committee whether it is not time to go forward and complete this bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] is opposed to this paragraph. He has opposed it consistently and strenuously. He does not want any appropriation for the completion of these iron-clads or the building of any ships on this bill. He has been defeated by a decided majority of the full committee. Now he comes in with an amendment to turn over the navy-yards to anybody who has a mind to bid, by an amendment, which I wish to say, with all due respect to him and to his business capacity, is not in my opinion offered in good faith, but to embarrass this bill at this stage. Therefore I hope the committee will vote his amendment down and proceed with the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understand the gentleman to impugn my good faith, and I want to ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understood the gentleman to impugn my good faith?

Mr. CANNON. No, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. To impute bad faith to me?

Mr. CANNON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask for the reading of the words.

Mr. CANNON. I will save you the time of reading the words, and will state what I did say. I said the gentleman from New York was opposed to this proposition in whole and in part, and opposed to any appropriation for building ships on this bill; that he had been defeated, and in my opinion, with his business ability and holding the views he does, that he did not offer this amendment in good faith to perfect the bill, but to further embarrass it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I say to the gentleman from Illinois that he must be an inexperienced legislator, indeed, if, having been defeated on the main proposition, he still does not think it right to perfect the bill in the public interest. I offered the amendment in good faith, to save the Treasury of the United States from plunder. It has been plundered enough in this business, and I want to stop it, and I had no other object whatever. I should like to stop the entire work, but if I cannot do that I want to see the money expended honestly and under proper supervision.

Mr. CANNON. One further word in reply to the gentleman from New York. He having said he offered the amendment in good faith, of course I am bound to take his word on that matter, and I say in my opinion he does offer the amendment in good faith, because he says so. But I want to say, if these contracts exist, as claimed, then the Government should stand up to them, and if they do not exist, then the Navy Department, under the law, will make the contracts, as it always has made such contracts. Again, I want to say on the top of that that the proposition to throw this work open to the bidding of the world, to persons with or without machine-shops, with or without experience, and the further proposition to turn over any or all the navy-yards to private bidders to do the work in, and the implied proposition to perfect the navy-yards so they would be available, which, I take it, is fairly implied, does not do that credit to the gentleman's business capacity which ought to be done to it, considering what his capacity is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the pro forma amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I renew it. My business capacity and reputation will have to take care of themselves. I do not think anything the gentleman from Illinois has said or can say will affect it in the estimate of the public.

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire to do so.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The whole tone of the gentleman's remarks was, first, to impute bad faith, and then when good faith was asserted to impute what might be called incompetency of judgment.

Mr. CANNON. I was merely disagreeing with you in your judgment, and I have the right to do that.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman must disagree in different language if he wants to disagree with me.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will pardon me. I wish to say now in the remarks I made I did not intend to impute to the gentleman want of good faith touching this matter, for he said it was in good faith. The remark I made touching his business capacity did not impugn that capacity, but combated the correctness of his judgment as to the last clause of this bill, and was intended to be respectful to the gentleman, for that is the opinion I entertain in regard to him.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Illinois has just seen great business firms of high standing in the Government signing contracts, not knowing what they were doing, and yet he impugns my business capacity. I have never signed such a contract yet. I know something of the way in which great business firms do their work, and they are not in the habit of putting their names to such contracts.

Now, in regard to the substance of this proposition. In deference to the suggestion of my colleague from New York, before the gentleman from Illinois spoke I went to the desk and modified this portion of the proposition, as far as it relates to the control of the navy-yards, to meet his objections, which I ask to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the proposed substitute as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall not expend any portion of the money hereby appropriated for the completion of the monitors until detailed plans and specifications of the work to be done shall have been carefully made by the board of advice and survey heretofore created: And provided further, That he shall advertise the same for open competition and shall award the contracts to the lowest responsible bidder in each case; and such contractor shall give security to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy; and the contractor may, with the assent of the Secretary of the Navy and subject to his control, have the right to do the work in any United States navy-yard suitable for the purpose or elsewhere in the United States, at his option; and nothing herein contained shall be construed to recognize the validity of the alleged contracts of March 3, 1877, in relation to these monitors, or to admit any claim for damages for the use and occupation of space in ship-yards for delay or for any other cause whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the proposed substitute.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a single remark in reply to an expression that fell from the lips of the member from New York when he was on his feet a little while ago. He says his amendment was made in good faith for the purpose of stopping plunder in these things, of which there had been enough already.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that remark was utterly without a shadow of foundation, and rests upon the statement of no man except the member from New York himself. All along the line of this investigation every board, the Mullaney, Stevens, Preble, Selfridge, every one of them, and every Secretary of the Navy expressly says that on thorough investigation there was not a shadow of suspicion of any bad faith or fraud on the part of any contractor for any of these iron-clads. And on the face of this statement, which is spread on the records of this House over and over again, it does not become the gentleman from New York with specious pretense of superior honesty to stand up here and attack the character and impugn the honesty of men as respectable at least as himself in the eyes of every community.

Now, I say if this substitute is voted down I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, with a single clause, to which I do not believe he objects, to wit, "except there shall be found to be a valid contract already existing for the said work," or a similar provision. With that addition I shall have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from New York for the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WILSON. Let that be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. It has already been reported three times.

Mr. BERRY. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is the one we want to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken upon the substitute.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 76.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BERRY. I call for the reading of it again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will not be adopted. If these contracts which have already been made are valid, if they are binding upon the Government, they should be respected. We have here a system of statutes providing how contracts may be made—and when they may be made. We certainly have not had time to go through and compare the provisions of this amendment with existing law upon that subject, and I prefer, for one, to turn this matter over to the Secretary of the Navy and let him, upon his responsibility as a public officer, expend this money.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand even from the gentleman from New Jersey that these contracts embrace the whole of the work to be done, but, on the contrary, I understand that these contracts made on the 3d of March, 1877, were applicable only to the engines and boilers of these various iron-clads. That is what I have understood during the course of this discussion and is in accordance with my best recollection. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ROBESON. As I understand, there are contracts for some of them already existing. Where there are no contracts existing, of course the Secretary of the Navy will have to make contracts according to existing law, which provides all the necessary securities and safeguards.

Mr. HOLMAN. But there is no law requiring him to invite proposals to do this work.

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, there is.

Mr. HOLMAN. The contracts of March 3, 1877, were not made in that way.

Mr. ROBESON. They were made on proposals.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Advertised?

Mr. ROBESON. No; not advertised.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. How was it done?

Mr. ROBESON. Strictly according to law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I find the following statement, made by the Secretary of the Navy in December, 1877:

> I deemed it also my duty to suspend these contracts, inasmuch as I regarded them as not authorized by law—> and to submit to Congress whether they should be recognized or canceled.

This was the language of the Secretary of the Navy in December, 1877—

Now, I am willing to accept the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey that to the extent there are now valid contracts outstanding to do this work, to that extent this proposition shall not apply; but as to the work to be done where there are now no valid contracts there shall be fair and open competition.

Gentlemen have to bear in mind this work is being done in private yards, and that the work done to this time was under contract. And now it is proposed to allow the balance of the work to be done without inviting proposals to do it, and without any fair and open competition. I am only asking fair and open competition for the doing of this work, that no fraud shall be perpetrated on the public Treasury. That, and nothing else, is the effect of this proposition.

I will modify my amendment further, for I do not intend to allow any possible ground to exist by which these millions shall be expended under private contracts without any opportunity for fair and open competition. I will modify my amendment by adding at the end of it the following words, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> But valid and legal contracts now existing touching any part of said work shall not be affected by this provision.

Mr. REED. I do not know for my part whether the existing laws require what the gentleman from Indiana has in his amendment. If they do not require it, then I think we ought not to require it here. I believe that it is a violation of sound business principles. Now, that may seem to be strange to gentlemen who have been in the habit of regarding competition as the sole principle of doing business. I believe there is something more than that. What we need is not economy as the first thing, but a construction that will be sound and effective. It is not a question of what money we pay so much as a question of what we get for our money. What we need is character on the part of builders rather than low bids. And I maintain that the business principle upon which the best navy of this world is constructed is not the principle of the lowest bidder.

No supervision by outside parties can ever make up for any lack of faithfulness on the part of men who do the work. The English Government build no engines in their yards. They let them all out to contract. They never invite general proposals and do not let the contracts out to the lowest bidders. On the contrary they select a few firms in whose character they have complete confidence and invite proposals from them and act upon them, and the result is that they get work made not upon inspection but what is far better upon honor.

I am well aware of the principle adopted by the gentlemen on the other side, notably by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] that the great business of life is to watch and see if you can get some mean thing against somebody implying that they have been stealing money. I know that is the way his mind runs, and he is not in the slightest to blame for it; because people act according to their methods.

The way in which this attack was brought on seems to me very singular. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] proposes his lowest-bidder compound navy-yard arrangement; and then it is followed up by the gentleman from Illinois, for he is the gentleman that usually attends to that department, by bringing forward a little contract business which has been thoroughly and completely exploded. And then, under cover of that, they endeavor to violate what seems to me to be true business principles, namely, the getting of what you want; for when you make a navy you have got to have something that is as nearly perfect as you can get. I know the United States Government always pays more than other people do for the work they get. But they are obliged to insure the nature of that work. It will not do to have it scamped in any way. I remember there was a vessel built in the navy-yard by contract, and when they got through they found that instead of driving copper bolts into holes that were a little smaller than the bolts, nine out of ten of them were driven into holes of the same size as the bolts. The consequence was, when the inspector came around the men were busily engaged in driving the bolts into the small holes, and when he went out of sight they drove them into the large holes. The result was, when she was launched she leaked like a sieve; and when she was taken up into the docks she looked like a pepper-box in full operation. [Laughter.] And that is just what might have been expected. With these gentlemen lowest-bidder economy is the great business of their lives. They want economy in vessels. Now, what we want is vessels, with economy; but we are willing to pay what they are worth. And I tell you the device of doing things by the lowest bidder never will get the worth of a dollar and a half for a dollar.

We in this world always have to pay in the long run a dollar for a dollar's worth. When men do business they select agents of high character, of such character as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] occasionally advertises himself to be. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KASSON. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I thank the gentleman. I have but little more to say, except to re-enforce what I have already said; that when you employ it is as much a question of the character of the man you employ as of the bids which are made. I say this is sound business. When we come to thoroughly respect our public officials, as we are bound to do in time, after this era of slander has gone by, we will trust them to make contracts, and the result will be that we will have public works as England has when we construct our public works on the principle that England adopts.

Mr. BAYNE. I beg leave to dissent from the views expressed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.] I must believe that in making contracts opportunity may be afforded for favoritism. Special friends may have opportunities which the general public may not have.

I think it is a wise course on the part of Congress to surround all of these things with such safeguards and such protection as will secure for the Government the best work for the least money. There is nothing that I can discover in existing law that requires the Secretary of the Navy to take such steps as will open this work to all the ship-builders of the country. Under existing law he may see fit to let the contract to this ship-builder or to that ship-builder. He may select a ship-builder who is not so good as some other one, and let the contract to him at a price that will be excessive.

The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will preclude that sort of thing and enable everybody to enter into an open, fair competition, and make bids for the work. The work which they may do will be subject to the scrutiny and supervision of the Navy Department all the while it is progressing. If the shipbuilder fails to do that work according to the contract, then, as is well known, the Government always holds its contractors to a rigid accountability.

I must think that, in order to exclude anything like favoritism, in order to get work done on sound business principles, it is as much the duty on the part of the Government as it is on the part of an individual to get the best work for the least money; and this direction should be given to the Secretary of the Navy, in order that he may procure the work to be done in that way.

I see nothing in the statutes that requires the Secretary of the Navy to act on rigid business principles. I do not know that the Secretary of the Navy will not pursue rigid business principles. I do not know what influences may be brought to bear upon the Secretary of the Navy. I assume that he is an honorable and an honest man; I know nothing to the contrary.

But I do know that men occupying official stations are subject to much pressure from many influential quarters, and it is wise on the part of Congress to direct those officers to prosecute their work on sound business principles, so that the Secretary of the Navy, when pressure is brought to bear on him, when he is asked to do things which he should not do, can point to the statutes and say that his course is there laid out for him.

There is an openness, there is a fairness, there is a justice about presenting this matter to the whole public, about advertising it in the papers, and letting the world know what is going on in the Navy Department and in every other Department. I want it done in that way, and for that reason I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is right in this, that there is no provision in the statutes that work of this kind shall be advertised and let to the lowest bidder. It is true that there never has been any statute passed by Congress providing for advertising and letting to the lowest bidder a certain kind of work.

I desire to call the attention of this committee to the fact that when it comes to the building of machinery, when it comes to the construction of engines, when it comes to the construction of that kind of work which requires a high degree of skill, it has never been the policy of the Government that the work should be let to the lowest bidder. It has never been the policy of any government to do that.

Where by an inspection of the goods you can fairly tell from an examination what is the quality of the article which is offered to the Government, there it should be open to competition in the open market. But when the lives of men, when vast property interests may depend upon the exercise of great skill, in all cases of that kind the Government has always reserved the right to employ men of honor and of proved skill to do the work. And it has always been the policy of Congress to trust the officers of the Government to that extent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Has he not already informed the committee that this very machinery, the engines of these proposed vessels, is now contracted for?

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand it is; and I understand the gentleman puts in his amendment a provision that it is to apply only in those cases where contracts are not already out. Now if there are such cases, I propose for one to trust the Government in the making of those contracts, and not to change the statutes of Congress and the policy of the Government ever since its foundation.

Mr. HOLMAN. In other words, the gentleman would rather trust the Secretary of the Navy, surrounded by influences which naturally would produce favoritism, to give out these contracts without limit as to price than to open competition among the business men of this country.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is nothing to prevent competition. I am unwilling to bind down the Navy Department to give this class of work to the lowest bidder. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has made light of the suggestion I made that there was perhaps something improper in regard to the obtaining of some of these contracts.

Mr. REED. I will say to the gentleman that if I "made light" of his remarks it is more than he ever made of them himself.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman has anything funny to say I will give way to him, because it is his forte to say something sharp and sarcastic—according to his opinion. There never has been a time in my legislative career when I was not willing to yield to the gentleman from Maine, because I know that when he opens his mouth a chunk of wisdom always flies out.

I did state that a contract had been made by a firm in Philadelphia with a Mr. Fralick for the purpose of securing favorable action from the Navy Department in regard to these very contracts now under consideration; and because I referred to this fact the gentleman from Maine seeks to throw ridicule upon me for calling the attention of the committee to a matter of this kind. He does not want to see anything of this sort; he prefers to "go it blind" and to heap up appropriations of millions to be expended lavishly without any limitation; and whoever questions the propriety of this policy meets his scorn and contempt.

Now, I did state that a contract corrupt in its nature had been made by a Philadelphia firm with regard to procuring these contracts; and upon an examination of the evidence I find that the firm does not deny that the contract was signed by the president of the firm, nor that he knew what he was about when he signed it. I ask the Clerk to read the extract in the New York Sun which I have marked, which will show the nature of this whole transaction now sought to be legalized by the action of Congress.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following:

Some time in March, 1879, when the monitor builders were especially anxious for the interests of their jobs, a contract was drawn between John W. Fralick and Charles H. Cramp, in which Fralick undertook "to secure special instructions from the Navy Department favorable to securing an appropriation from Congress" for the completion of the Terror, and Cramp agreed to pay Fralick for this service 5 per cent. of the money appropriated. Cramp's Sons wanted something over half a million; Fralick's 5 per cent. on the job would amount to nearly $30,000.

This agreement was signed by Charles H. Cramp, president of the company. Although it was nominally with Fralick it was really with Fralick and William K. Rogers. The original draft of the agreement is in existence. It is in the handwriting of Mr. Hayes's private secretary.

The contract itself is not in existence. It was burned about a year ago in Philadelphia in the presence of Mr. Cramp. It was put out of the way for reasons which will appear.

After Fralick had made the written agreement with the president of the Cramp company, he was furnished with letters of introduction to Charles H. Secor, who is interested in the Phineas Burgess contracts on the Monadnock, building in California, and to Gause, the manager of Harlan, Hollingsworth & Co., of Wilmington, at whose yard the Amphitrite is waiting appropriations. There was a conference between several of the contractors at a hotel in Philadelphia, at which the proposals of Fralick were discussed. This meeting was arranged by Secor by telegraph from here, where Fralick awaited the decision. Fralick claims that on the part of these other contractors there was an unwritten agreement to join with the Cramps in compensating him for his influence with the Hayes crowd. Everything went swimmingly at the Executive end of the line. Thompson became more and more convinced of the necessity of completing the lumbering iron-clads as a measure of national defense; and Hayes sent in Thompson's recommendations to Congress and said a good word in private for the job when opportunity offered.

Before the reading of the extract was concluded Mr. SPRINGER's time expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is a very small portion of the extract which the Clerk has not read. I ask consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection it can be printed in the RECORD.

Several members objected.

Mr. ROBESON. Let the gentleman print the whole of it if he wants to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair heard objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire simply to have printed in the RECORD the remainder of the extract which I have marked. I want to know whether there is objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to state further that Mr. Rogers retained his position under President Hayes until the close of that administration.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Mississippi, there were—ayes 54, noes 75.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROBESON and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 89.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting the following at the end of the pending proposition:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used for political purposes or be subject to any political assessment to aid in the election of any person to any office or to a seat in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to be heard on the point of order. The Chair has already ruled where the object of the proposition is to impose a limit on an expenditure it is in order. The Chair had occasion to so rule in passing on the point of order made on this very paragraph. It ruled that under the third clause of the twenty-first rule of the House the proposition to limit expenditures and impose restrictions on the expenditure of the public money was in order. And that is just what this provision does. It requires that no part of this money shall be expended for political purposes or to aid in the election of any person to office or to a seat in this House. It is a clear limitation, and it seems almost impossible the Chair can decide it to be out of order, in view of the decision he has already made. From the extraordinary vote just taken, when it was shown by fair computation a million of dollars might be saved, it is easy to see what will be the effect of leaving this matter entirely to the discretion of an officer of the Government without imposing any restriction upon him whatever.

Mr. HISCOCK. My point is this, that the amendment is new legislation, not in the line of economy, and that it is not germane to this proposition. Here is a provision of law providing affirmatively for the expenditure of money, and its being used for any other purpose is excluded by the provision itself. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, providing it shall not go in a certain direction, is certainly not germane to the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing on all occasions whenever it is proper that provision should be introduced here and voted on limiting the expenditure of money for political purposes, but I can but regard the attempt to do it at this time and in this way—and I use the word in no offensive sense to the gentleman from Indiana—as a pure piece of demagogism which it is the duty of every man connected with this bill in reporting it to this House to resist, and therefore I do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit a remark touching the ruling of the Chair. An amendment was offered providing that no part of this sum should be applied to repairs of any wooden ships where the estimated cost of such repair exceeded 35 per cent. of the estimated cost. The Chair ruled that the amendment was in order. Here is a simple declaration this money shall not be used for certain other purposes.

I wish to say in regard to the term "demagogism" used by the gentleman from New York that I am perfectly willing to let that go to the country with the spectacle of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who ought to guard the public Treasury, deliberately permitting a line of policy to be adopted which may in the way of favoritism take millions of dollars out of the Treasury.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say one word as it touches a precedent, and it proposed to settle it contrary to what the principle was some days ago on an appropriation bill where the point was ruled against me. If the Chairman follows that precedent he must rule it out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. I was stating when the attention of the Chair was called away that a different chairman on one of the appropriation bills ruled against the proposition I had the honor to offer regulating the disbursement of funds. If the present chairman adheres to that precedent, of course this must be ruled out of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. The cases are not analagous. The other case was a provision for a system of examination.

Mr. KASSON. One other word. Under this law and under the laws of the United States it is impossible that an officer of the Government can expend any of this money for political purposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. He can.

Mr. KASSON. It is impossible, for every expenditure is made on a voucher showing it is for an object provided for by this law.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me demonstrate the fact.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Wait a moment. If it is of no use in that direction what is it the gentleman proposes? That the man who receives the money for honest work shall not expend it for political purposes. Either the Government must pay it or the man who receives the money must do it. The Government cannot do it under existing law, and every gentleman on the floor knows it. Then does the gentleman wish to prevent the recipient of the money from doing it? Then he is endeavoring to restrict the liberty of the individual in the disbursement of his own money. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will permit me——

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman from Indiana will admit that I have the floor by the rule.

Therefore the only use that such an amendment can possibly lay claim to (and I am disposed always to look to the effect of these things) is to restrict the improper use of money. Now when you can properly restrict the improper use of money I am with you. But to claim, under a proposition to pay these men the money that is due to them for their labor or material, the right to say they shall not use it as their own money is a proposition to which I can never give my consent. It is entirely foreign to our legislation here, and is not germane to this bill, which is a bill to pay men for labor and material, and not to tell how they shall use the money they are entitled to receive.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think the Chair ought to alternate in the recognitions on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized gentlemen on both sides.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Two gentlemen have spoken upon that side——

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Illinois has spoken twice on the question, however.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, something on the point of order. I think I can talk on that without discussing the merits.

Is this proposiiion in order? I think it clearly is not; and if we will lay down our feelings about the merits, we will have no difficulty in arriving at a proper conclusion on that point. It is, in the first place, an attempt to legislate upon an appropriation bill——

Mr. SPRINGER. The whole bill is for that object.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If my friend from Illinois will not make his speech all along the line of my remarks, he will accommodate me very much indeed.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. And everybody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Truth offends the gentleman from Massachusetts more than the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Nothing offends that comes from the gentleman from Illinois. What he says is quite immaterial.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is important because it is the truth.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Important to himself perhaps, but I hope he will withhold it and allow me to proceed without interruption. I mean no disrespect whatever, but I want to go on.

What I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, is this. This is simply a repetition of what my friend from Indiana offered when we were considering another bill making appropriations a short time ago. He now proposes that none of the money appropriated by this act shall be used for political purposes. Now, what moneys are appropriated by this act? Plainly not only money used for the construction and repair of ships in the Navy, &c., but also money that is paid for salaries—money earned by men for their labor.

Then the gentleman proposes to say that Mr. Jones or Mr. Brown or Mr. Smith, who has a salary or compensation for work done for the Government, or for material furnished, shall not, after he has received the money and put it in his pocket, use it for certain purposes. Now, if it is right for my friend, in a parliamentary way, to place that restriction upon the earnings of these men, with equal propriety might he say they shall not apply the money thus received for the purchase of cotton cloth, or anything else whatever. He may even say that they shall not journey in Indiana with that money if this right is conceded. He may make laws to control the expenditure of any money that ceases to be the property of the United States when it has been paid over, and in that way control the expenditure of any individual or the private expenditures of any person whatever who receives compensation from the Government. It means that or it means nothing.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Certainly. I will yield for a question and on that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is on that point that I desire to ask it. Does it not mean that whoever of the officers of the Government have the power to apply this money shall not thereby enlarge the contracts or otherwise appropriate the money to be used corruptly for political purposes?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My friend is plainly answered when I say that if he means that he is competent to draw an amendment that says that.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment says that and nothing else.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If you mean nothing else, or if you mean anything more, write the amendment over and let us talk on the point of order again; but I want to meet the proposition which the gentleman has submitted. He has contrived something here which he wants to go further than the proposition would seem, or than that which meets us at the threshold. Now I propose to meet his proposition right away at the threshold.

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose, if the gentleman will pardon me, that the officers of this Government in the expenditures of this money shall not directly or indirectly use it for corrupt political purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The law is sufficient as it is, so far as the expenditure of the moneys of the United States is concerned, but my friend wants to go further and say that the men who earn the money shall not expend as they please their own earnings. That the law shall exercise a censorship and control of the money even after it has passed to the individual. That is the substance and the purport of the amendment; and as to the point of order, it is new legislation and out of order on this bill. It is a discrimination, a dictation as to the use of the individual means not warranted by law or reason. It has no applicability to the subject under consideration; it has no place in this legislation, and if the gentleman wants to enact it he had better seek a more appropriate place.

Mr. WILSON. I have been very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It occurs to me his theory is altogether too fine-spun. It cannot be intended or supposed that this money can be followed into the hands of the man who earns it as salary, or by furnishing materials. The amendment cannot be so construed. Under the Constitution and under the law, this Congress has the power to determine and the authority to say how the money shall be used. Now, I think I can show to my friend across the way how it can be found this money is used for political purposes without following it into the hands of the receiver, the man who earns it either for labor or materials furnished. Take one of these Government contractors, one of these ship-builders who has to disburse the money. Let him have applications from a dozen gentlemen to furnish the material or do the work. They will not promise him to vote the Republican ticket. Another party corresponding in number to those may agree, if they get the work, that they will vote the Republican ticket.

Mr. ROBESON. Does it require a law to make that unlawful?

Mr. WILSON. You can at least make that provision on the face of the statute, and I think it is competent for this House to do so under the rules.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the gentleman from West Virginia, would he think it right to put into the legislative, executive, and judicial bill a clause which would be practical in its result providing that no part of the salaries paid to members of Congress shall be expended for political purposes?

Mr. WILSON. When the mechanic receives his money he has the right to do with it what he pleases; and if he chooses to make a voluntary contribution, no power on earth can prevent it.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to reply to a suggestion made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that this money could not be used to advance political interest, because the law requires the Secretary to show a voucher for the expenditure of every dollar. If the law was as we desire to have it, I would concede his conclusion is true. But the Republican majority of this House have just decided that there shall be no competition as to bids, but that the disposition of this money shall be left absolutely to favoritism, to be settled and determined by the Secretary of the Navy alone.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman from Iowa declined to permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. KASSON. I merely asked the gentleman to wait a moment.

Mr. BRAGG. Then I ask the gentleman from Iowa to wait. You have decided it must be left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, go back to the history of the campaign of Florida in 1876, and see the sagacity of the general-in-chief of the Republican forces in Florida; and when you have considered and fully weighed that sagacity and management, see how great a stretch of it it will be for him to say to one favorite when he comes to him, "I can let you have this contract if you will contribute $100,000 to support the Cameron ticket in Pennsylvania;" or to another one, "I will let you have it if you will contribute so much for the good of the party; otherwise we must let it go to somebody else." Thus you get your hundred thousand or half a million of dollars for the benefit of the party and you get your voucher back on the contract all slick and smooth. And whenever anybody shall peach as to the truth of the transaction and show what the agreement has been, you can say to him as of Fralick to-day: "He is a perjured scoundrel; who believes any Republican would ever do that?" [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is proposed as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which is a substitute for the portion of the bill from line 396 to the end of the paragraph. The Chair thinks the amendment applies to the entire bill, and is not in order at this time.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair states that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is not in order at this time. Will the Chair please state at what stage of the bill it will be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. When that question arises the Chair will decide upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBOTT. I offer the following amendment, which I think will be accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] and also by the Committee on Appropriations. I propose to insert, at the end of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all plans for the completion of the armor and armament of the said iron-clad vessels provided for in this bill shall be submitted to the board of advice and survey created by this act for its approval or disapproval.

Mr. ROBESON. I accept that.

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks on this bill.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. TALBOTT.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. We have now finished the bill. I desire to offer an amendment to come in as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section the following:

"SEC. 3. Officers of the Navy shall, whenever the Secretary of the Navy may deem it advisable, be required to perform such duties at the navy-yards and stations as have hitherto been performed by civil employés paid from the appropriations for the civil establishments, and no officer of the Navy whose pay is appropriated for in this bill shall be employed on any shore duty unless the Secretary of the Navy shall determine that the employment of an officer on such duty is required by the public interests, and shall so state in the order of employment; and all other officers when not at sea shall be placed on leave of absence, on waiting orders, or on furlough, as the Secretary of the Navy may direct."

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to have this amendment explained.

Mr. BOWMAN. I rise principally with the view of endeavoring to obtain some information concerning the scope of this amendment, which it seems to me is rather an important proposition.

As the bill now stands, if I understand it correctly, it will in the near future drive out of the service of the Navy all civilians from staff positions. Shipwrights, engineers, and others from civil life cannot hold any staff position in the Navy, unless they happen to be graduates of the Naval Academy. And this amendment now proposed provides that all the remaining positions in the navy-yards of the country, which may now be filled by civilians, experts in their different trades and callings, may be filled by the line officers of the Navy who are graduates of Annapolis. That, in substance, shuts all the yards against civilians, if, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, or of the line officers who may possibly have influence with him, it may be deemed advisable. It seems to me that we have gone far enough in that direction, though perhaps I have misapprehended the object of the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman misapprehends entirely the intention of the amendment. In the first place, this proposition prohibits the Secretary of the Navy from assigning officers to shore duty when there is no shore duty for them to perform.

Mr. McCOOK. Has he ever done that?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is claimed that it has been done, and that there is a great abuse in this direction. Whenever the exigencies and necessities of the service require that a man shall be assigned to shore duty he should be so assigned. This provision is directory upon the Secretary of the Navy in that respect.

I will state another purpose of the amendment. It is absolutely necessary that some service, such as that indicated by this provision, should be given to officers in the Navy, or else they will have nothing in the world to do.

There are now four hundred and eighty-one officers of the Navy assigned to shore duty, and in the majority of instances shore duty means just no duty at all. If they are to be paid, what reason is there why they should not be assigned to duty at the navy-yards, or at any other place where they can be employed upon respectable work, and where their services can be made valuable to the Government.

Mr. KASSON. I think that that portion of the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] after the printed parts ought to be explained satisfactorily or left out of the amendment. For the purpose of raising the question, I will move to strike out all after the printed clause which authorizes the employment of officers of the Navy at the navy-yards. That is left discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy, and therefore I have no objection to it. The other part of the amendment takes away certain rights and privileges of the Navy, and a certain discretion which I think ought to exist somewhere.

Mr. ROBESON. The discretion is left entirely with the Secretary of the Navy. The amendment provides only that no officer shall be ordered to shore duty unless the Secretary of the Navy determines that the employment of an officer on that duty is for the interest of the service, and will so state in his orders. That is done in view of the fact that there are more than four hundred and fifty men employed on shore duty, and one hundred and ninety-three line officers are employed on shore duty here in the city of Washington.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in immediately preceding the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. It must, to be in order, be an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to offer it to come in at the close of the paragraph as amended on motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not now in order. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] moves an amendment to that amendment. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REED. I think that this amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will do nothing but harm to both the Navy and the navy-yards. A navy-yard is in its very essence a civil establishment, and I think as many officers are now employed in our navy-yards as it is for the public interest should be so employed. There is no reason in the world why they should seek to drive the civilians out of a civilian establishment. You might just as well direct that the officers of the Navy shall do clerical work in the Department as to adopt this amendment providing for their performing clerical work in the navy-yards. I think this proposition will demoralize the navy-yards and demoralize the service. If we cannot find anything else for the naval officers to do, the sooner we give them a year's pay and let them go the better.

Mr. KASSON. I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and let the vote be taken on the original amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of this bill a single question. I understood him to say that there are now one hundred and ninety-three officers on shore duty in the city of Washington.

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know what that shore duty is?

Mr. ROBESON. The Navy Department reports that there are one hundred and ninety-three officers; fourteen of them are warrant officers, so that there are now one hundred and eighty regular commissioned officers of the Navy on shore duty here in Washington, according to the Register of the Navy for 1882.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman consider that shore duty generally useless?

Mr. ROBESON. I think not, but I think there are one hundred too many officers on that duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey by adding the following:

That no part of the money appropriated by the foregoing provision touching said iron-clads shall be used for political purposes or be subject to any political assessment to aid in the election of any person to any office or to a seat in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ROBESON, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 101, noes 9.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to amend by adding as a new section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. After all vacancies in the lower grades of the line and staff corps of the Navy and of the Marine Corps shall have been filled, nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the promotion into the appropriate corps and grades of not more than ten of the remaining graduates of the year at the conclusion of their six years' course who may stand highest in the order of merit as determined by the academic board of the Naval Academy.

Mr. ROBESON. The effect of this provision can be explained in a word. By this bill we put a stop to promotions in several corps until they reach a certain number. But in the mean time we wish to provide by this amendment, at the suggestion of the Navy Department, that the ten highest graduates at the academy shall not be excluded from entering the service even if there shall not be an exactly appropriate vacancy for them, but they shall go in among the body of cadet-midshipmen for promotion when an opportunity arises.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. By unanimous consent I was authorized to offer an amendment, which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "corps," in line 38, page 3, insert the following:
"But naval constructors and assistant naval constructors may be appointed from civil life."

Mr. RANDALL. The existing law makes the same provision as this amendment. What is the need of adopting it?

Mr. HISCOCK. Because the provisions in this bill repeal the existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. Then strike out what you have put in.

Mr. ROBESON. We provide in the bill that certain classes of officers shall be appointed only from the graduates at the Naval Academy. This amendment makes an exception as to constructors and assistant constructors, who, under the amendment, may be appointed from civil life, thus leaving the Department a little more latitude.

Mr. REED. I ask that a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair upon this subject may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
May 16, 1882.

SIR: In compliance with your request for an expression of opinion from me relative to Senate bill No. 1578, introduced by Senator MCPHERSON on March 27, 1882, I have the honor to make the following statement:

While I have some ideas relative to the several subjects embodied in the bill, I have considered it best to refer to such portions only as have, or would seem to have, a bearing upon the naval constructors, and such other matters as pertain more particularly to this bureau.

Section 6 of the bill provides, "That hereafter all commissioned officers of the Navy (except medical officers and chaplains) and one-half the commissioned officers of the marine corps shall be appointed from graduates of the Naval Academy who shall have passed its prescribed examinations."

As the above-quoted section includes the naval constructors and the assistant naval constructors, and as I am thoroughly convinced that, under the present system, it is impossible to educate the cadets at the Naval Academy so as to qualify them for the responsible positions of naval constructors, I cannot concur in the provisions thereof.

Section 1403 United States Revised Statutes provides that cadet-engineers graduated with credit from the mechanical class at the Naval Academy, and recommended by the academic board, may be immediately appointed assistant naval constructors. Two cadet-engineers were appointed under this law, but not immediately upon their graduation; they having devoted two years to the prosecution of their studies at the Royal Naval College, England. And the facts of the case now are, while these men are undoubtedly good men theoretically, and will be able to perform good service in the drawing-room, after their three years' course at school, they will require many years of experience in the navy-yards of our country before they will be competent to conduct work in which practical mechanical knowledge is requisite, and in which is involved the proper and judicious expenditure of very large sums of money.

I have had considerable correspondence with Chief Naval Constructor William H. White, of the English navy, who, for over two years, and while the two cadet-engineers herein referred to were at the Royal School, was the instructor in naval architecture, and while he accords these cadets much credit for the advancement made, states that they illustrate how very necessary a previous practical knowledge of the work in building a ship is; that they will undoubtedly make splendid draughtsmen, and when in time they have acquired the requisite knowledge and experience they will be valuable men.

The naval constructors in the English navy have for years been supplied from a small body of students who begin their careers as shipwright apprentices, three of whom are admitted each year to a course of three years at the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, England. This course is the highest pursued at the college, and is of the very first importance to the naval service. These students are obtained by a very simple and admirable method adopted by the admiralty for the appointment and training of shipwright apprentices in the dock yards. From among those who have served five years are selected, by competitive examination, the three who are to have the course of study at the Royal College. On passing the examination at the end of the three years' course they are appointed assistants to foremen at the dock-yards, and later to positions as assistant draughtsmen, draughtsmen, assistant constructors, constructors, and chief constructors; the highest position being that of director of naval construction.

The best way for our Government to educate our future naval constructors is to commence by appointing to the position of shipwright apprentice young men who have a first-class common-school education, and who, after three or four years of practical training in our navy-yards, could be examined competitively, and three selected annually to be sent to the Naval Academy for further study in the higher branches of mathematics, mechanics, and the French language; after being graduated from there they should be sent abroad and entered at the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, for a full course in naval architecture.

By this means, and no other, can we expect to educate the naval constructor of the future, that he may be able to keep pace with and participate in the great strides now making in the science and art of naval construction.

Respectfully submitted,

T. D. WILSON, Chief of Bureau.

Hon. WM. E. CHANDLER, Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment of Mr. REED was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by adding as a new section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used for political purposes, or be subject to any assessments to aid in the election of any person to any office or to a seat in the Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled upon this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair ruled out a similar amendment on the ground that it was not in order at that time and with reference to the then pending provision. I now offer it as an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this amendment not only proposes to control the expenditure by the Navy Department of the money appropriated in this bill, but it proposes to control the manner in which the money shall be used after it has been paid out by the Government to individuals. Thus it would change existing law, and is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I ask the Chair to state the point of order, and also the decision, so that the Committee of the Whole may vote advisedly upon the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated the grounds of his decision, from which the gentleman from Indiana appeals, and the question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 40.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr HOLMAN and Mr. ROBESON as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 99, noes 48.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. ROBESON moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. ROBESON demanded the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. ROBESON moved to reconsider the vote ordering the previous question; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the amendments be agreed to.

Mr. REED. I move that the House adjourn. I think we had better do it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 68.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BRAGG. I wish to have a separate vote on every amendment.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, strike out "44" and insert "48;" and strike out "5," in line 27, and insert "23."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I move that the House now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 65.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I demand tellers.

Mr. ROBESON. Rather than detain the House longer to-night I will move the House adjourn.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let the vote be taken over.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent;

A bill (H. R. No. 6394) for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing the appointment of Humphrey H. Lemon upon the Capitol police force; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the President of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, transmitting treasurer's report of receipts and disbursements of said company for the year ending December 31, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

JEFFERSON'S GRANDCHILD.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print some remarks on the bill proposing a pension to Jefferson's grandchild. [See Appendix.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, by unanimous consent, was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at six o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorial and petitions were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLACKBURN: The petition of citizens of Lexington, Kentucky, for the enactment of a national bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BUCK: The petition of Charles Baxter and others, for the correction of error in Revised Statutes relating to the duty on knit goods—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. S. S. COX: Memorial of the Independent Labor party of New York, relative to the head-money tax on immigrants—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DEUSTER: The petition of J. C. Adams, protesting against the passage of bill (H. R. No. 6666) relating to the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians in the State of Wisconsin—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. JOYCE: The petition of operatives employed by George A. Wattles, knit goods manufacturer, for the correction of error in the Revised Statutes relating to the duty on knit goods—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MASON: The petition of Virgil L. Mathews and others, citizens of the State of New York, asking for the passage of a bill granting land warrants to the officers and soldiers of the war of the rebellion—to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

By Mr. McKINLEY: The petitions of Anthony Howe and others, of Youngstown, and of Richard J. Read and others, of Canton, Ohio, for the passage of a bill fixing the rates of duty on manufactures of iron and steel, &c.—severally to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of manufacturers of china and earthenware, of Steubenville, Ohio, for increase of duty on earthenware—to the same committee.

By Mr. McLANE: The petition of Samuel H. Travers, for indemnity for seizure by the Government authorities of the brig Solferino—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. PHISTER: The petition of C. D. Outten and 14 others, United States storekeepers and gaugers, of the ninth collection district of Kentucky, for increase of pay and for one month's leave of absence with pay—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. E. W. ROBERTSON: The petition of citizens of Osyka, Mississippi, and Taypaho, Louisiana, relative to the enactment of a law for the regulation of interstate commerce—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RYAN: The petition of members of the bar of Leavenworth, Kansas, for the passage of the Senate bill creating United States appellate courts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHALLENBERGER: The petition of the American Home Mission Society, praying that justice be done to the Indians in the matter of needful appropriations under existing treaties and that they be allowed lands in severalty, &c.—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of R. P. Vance, for the establishment of a post-route from Davidson's River to Hope via Enon; also, from Hominy Creek to Hotton via Brown's Knob, in the State of North Carolina—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. YOUNG: The petition of Frances J. Russum, for compensation for property taken and occupied by the United States authorities during the war of the rebellion—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 6, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 5536) to reissue a Treasury draft originally issued to George G. Cobb, an assistant assessor in Alabama, deceased, to J. E. Cobb, custodian of the minor children of said decedent;

A bill (H. R. No. 6394) for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 6419) granting four condemned cannon to Otis Chapman Post No. 103 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Chicopee, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing the appointment of Humphrey H. Lemon upon the Capitol police force; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of Captain James Mercur, Corps of Engineers, of an examination of Oregon Inlet, North Carolina, made in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a petition of 369 ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Seneca Falls, New York, and a petition of citizens of Oswego, New York, praying for the passage of a bill granting a pension of $40 per month to those who lost an arm or a leg in the service of the Government during the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the city of New York, praying for the passage of an act to prohibit the taking of menhaden and other fish with purse nets and by steam-vessels within two miles of the coast; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of citizens of Monmouth, New Jersey, praying for the passage of a bill to prevent the taking of menhaden and other fish with purse nets and by steam-vessels within two miles of the coast; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALDRICH presented the petition of Patrick Cook, of the city of Washington, praying for relief and allowance of amount awarded to him by the board of experts of the late board of audit, District of Columbia, for damages to his property in Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6625) to authorize the Washington and Atlantic Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6626) to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 156) to provide for the suspension of collection of special assessments in the District of Columbia until the improvements which said assessments were made to pay for are fully completed, reported adversely thereon; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1812) for the relief of Michael H. Collins, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2117) fixing the salaries of the judges of the district courts, instruct me to report it with an amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. It merely increases the salaries of the judges $500 apiece with one exception.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be read as it would stand if amended.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The Committee on the Judiciary propose, in line 5, after the word "law," to strike out "shall hereafter be at the rate of $5,000 per annum each" and in lieu thereof to insert "shall hereafter be increased by the addition of $500 per annum each;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the salaries of the judges of the several district courts of the United States, except the district of California, (in which the salary shall remain as now fixed by law,) shall hereafter be increased by the addition of $500 per annum each.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator who reports the bill if it is intended to reach all the district judges and to increase all the salaries $500?

Mr. HOAR. It merely adds $500. This is the best solution that we could make of the difficulty. The bill raises the salaries of those now receiving $3,500 to $4,000, and of those who are now receiving $4,000 to $4,500. It does not affect the salary of the district judge in California, who now receives $6,000.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to object to the consideration of this bill because it was presented and read before I was able to say what I proposed to do. I shall, however, endeavor (and I have no doubt I shall be somewhat blamed for doing it) to have the Calendar called, and shall object to the consideration of anything except in regular order from this time on. I desire to make the statement now, so that when I do it it will be when there is no bill up and no Senator can take offense, as several have done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is an objection in order to the bill now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I object.

Mr. HOAR. I ask my friend to hear me. This matter has been brought before the Senate. I am assured that a very considerable majority of the Senate are in favor of making the salary of all these judges $5,000. There are three or four districts in the country, not more, where there is a feeling on the part of some Senators that the judge is not occupied enough to warrant such a salary; but this bill proposes simply to add $500. In New York now, for instance, the district judge receives only $4,000, and so in Boston and Philadelphia, where they are employed all the year round.

It seems to us that the Senate would probably be willing to make this slight addition, which would be some relief to these gentlemen who are overworked, as a compromise, and then when the bill of the Senator from Illinois passes, if it should ever pass, Congress can deal with the subject, if it shall see fit. I hope my friend from Delaware will not object.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe as a general rule the district judges are amply paid. There may be individual exceptions, but this is a proposition now to increase the salaries of all the district judges. To that I am opposed. I help to pay the taxes as other people help to pay the taxes which pay these judges. Why should we give judges who are already sufficiently compensated an additional increase? I know that in the district in which I reside, which is a very small one and where very little business is done, the district judge is paid $1,000 or $1,500 more than the chief-justice of our State court, more than the chancellor of the State. Our people have had to practice economy with their limited revenues, and they do not believe in large salaries, and I am here to represent them.

I say that I am opposed to this general increase of the salaries of the district judges. There may be individual exceptions, and if they can be provided for I am perfectly willing the salaries should be increased in those cases, but as to this general sweep, giving to all judges increased pay, I am opposed to it simply because they have enough.

Mr. MORGAN. If the business of the morning hour is concluded——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to raise a question of order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order, if the morning hour is closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not closed. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I object to any debate upon any question until the morning hour is closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts, it will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1294) more effectually to suppress gaming in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BUTLER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of George R. Herrick and others, praying additional compensation as members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia under the joint resolution approved February 28, 1867, to report it favorably, accompanied by a report, with a recommendation to the Committee on Appropriations that the following clause be inserted in the proper appropriation bill, to wit:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the officers, clerks, and employés of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia or their legal representatives the amounts due them under the joint resolution of Congress of February 28, 1867, $46,846.86.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed, under the rule, and the proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2049) for the relief of John P. Walworth, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 392) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6627) to authorize the establishment of a free public highway in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 282) for the relief of James Bridger, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to authorize the Secretary of State to purchase 500 copies of Cummings' edition of Hickey's Constitution and 200 copies of the same for the use of each Senator and Representative of the Forty-seventh Congress, designed as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The printing under the resolution would cost about $160,000. The amendment was referred to the Committee on Printing, to be considered by them with a view of referring it to the Committee on Appropiations on the sundry civil bill.

The report was agreed to.

REPORT OF SURGEON-GENERAL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print for the use of the Navy Department 1,500 copies of the report of the Surgeon-General of the Navy, have instructed me to report it with an amendment reducing the number to 1,000. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which was reported with an amendment, to strike out "1,500" and insert "1,000;" so as to read:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Navy Department 1,000 copies of the report of the Surgeon-General of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator if any copies of that report have been published for use other than by the Surgeon-General?

Mr. ANTHONY. None.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why are so many printed for the Surgeon-General and none for any one else?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a publication of great scientific and medical value, and there has been a great demand for it from medical societies and from surgeons. When a Senator or Representative receives a request for a copy he can send to the Surgeon-General and get it in that way, which the committee thought better than having the report distributed by members of Congress indiscriminately.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ORANGE-TREE CULTURE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to which was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for printing 5,000 copies of the report on insects affecting the orange tree, have directed me to report it back without amendment, recommend its passage, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and concurred in, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed 5,000 copies of a special report from the Department of Agriculture, on insects affecting the orange tree, with the necessary illustrations, 2,500 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

ECONOMIC ENTOMOLOGY.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to which was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for printing 1,000 copies of a special report entitled Bibliography of Economic Entomology, for the use of the Department of Agriculture, has had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and concurred in, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed for the use of the Department of Agriculture 1,000 copies of a special report entitled Bibliography of Economic Entomology.

FOREST-TREE INSECTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to which was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to print 2,000 copies of the fifth report of the United States entomological commission for the use of the Department of Agriculture, has instructed me to report it without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and concurred in, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed, for the use of the Department of Agriculture, with necessary illustrations, 2,500 copies of the fifth report of the United States entomological commission, being a special report on the insects affecting forest trees.

SUEZ CANAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to which was referred a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending the publication of Professor Nourse's report on the Suez Canal, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report a concurrent resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report of Professor Nourse on the Suez Canal be printed, and that there be printed 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the Navy Department.

OFFICIAL RECORDS OF THE REBELLION.

Mr. ANTHONY. There was a report made from the Committee on Printing the other day, which was laid over. It is a joint resolution authorizing the printing of 2,500 additional copies of the Official Records of the Rebellion. I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is now satisfied with the resolution as it was reported.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to repeat in regard to this measure what I have said, that our present method of distributing and printing public documents is one of the most wasteful, extravagant, and unbusiness-like arrangements which we have under the Government. The Senator from Rhode Island, representing the Committee on Printing of the Senate, has repeatedly endeavored to have a bill passed providing for a more proper system. The librarians of the country have agreed upon a measure which they desire. I understand that the Senate has more than once passed such a bill, but it does not get consideration in the other branch.

I am satisfied that the only mode of compelling the consideration of such a bill is to put upon a resolve providing for printing and distributing particular documents a suitable system of distribution. I propose, therefore, to do that, but I will not detain the Senate by insisting on a consideration of that matter on this resolution, which is a great improvement on what has come from the House; but I give notice that when the provision for printing and distributing the census or some other report which is of great public importance comes up, I shall insist on trying the sense of the Senate as to the propriety of annexing to that a condition for the proper distribution of the publication.

Therefore, I will withdraw the objection I made the other day to this particular resolve.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 87) authorizing the printing of 2,500 additional copies of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion. It provides that there be printed and bound of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion 2,500 additional copies, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the War Department, 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 500 copies for sale by the Public Printer.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution No. 39 and the concurrent resolution, for which the joint resolution which has just been passed was reported as a substitute, will be postponed indefinitely.

SIGNAL SERVICE REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are two or three other resolutions that were laid over that I should like to have action upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions referred to by the Senator from Rhode Island will be called up in their order.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution for printing the report of the Chief Signal Officer for 1881, reported from the Committee on Printing July 1:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed and bound for the use of the Signal Office and the Department of War 2,500 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for 1881.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Department asked for 10,000 copies and the committee have reduced the number to 2,500.

The resolution was agreed to.

CRUISE OF THE TICONDEROGA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution, reported by Mr. ANTHONY from the Committee on Printing July 1:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report by Commodore R. W. Shufeldt, United States Navy, of his cruise around the world in the United States steamer Ticonderoga be printed, with 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the use of the Navy Department.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTEROCEANIC COMMUNICATION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution, reported by Mr. ANTHONY from the Committee on Printing July 1:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report by Lieutenant John T. Sullivan, United States Navy, on the problem of interoceanic communication by way of the American Isthmus, be printed, with 5,000 additional copies, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 500 for the use of the Navy Department.

The resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT POUGHKEEPSIE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York, which was, in line 11, to strike out "seventy" and insert "sixty;" so as to read:

The site and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $65,000.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS, Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, and Mr. VEST were appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2123) for the relief of the employés who worked in, and the contractors who furnished castings to, the United States armory at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, and were not paid from January 1, 1861, to April 17, 1861, inclusive; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALDRICH asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2124) for the relief of George C. and William J. Munro; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAHONE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 89) directing the Secretary of War to loan tents and camp equipage to the Second Regiment of Virginia Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of California, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the consideration of the papers relating to Senate bill No. 2005, and that David D. Tryon have leave to withdraw the same from the files of the Senate.

SORGHUM-SUGAR REPORT.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be directed to furnish for the use of the Senate a copy of the report of the Committee of the National Academy of Sciences upon the subject of sorghum sugar.

LAWRENCE S. BRUMIDI.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further routine business, the morning hour is closed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In pursuance of the notice given yesterday, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6242.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to make a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, out of order. The bill ought to have been reported a month or two ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1516) for the relief of the heir of Constantino Brumidi, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask to have the bill placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VOORHEES. Why not consider it now? I think it ought to be considered at once. I ask for the present consideration of the bill, unless the Senator from Vermont thinks it ought not to be considered at this time,

Mr. MORRILL. If there is no objection, the bill ought to be considered.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let us consider it and pass it at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Lawrence S. Brumidi, heir of the late Constantino Brumidi, under his last will, dated June 27, 1879, filed in the office of the register of wills for the District of Columbia, $1,500, in three annual installments of $500 each, as payment in full for designs made by Constantino Brumidi for the embellishment of the belt of the Rotunda of the Capitol.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I stated yesterday that after the routine business of the morning hour had been gone through with to-day I would move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1683) for the relief of Ben Holladay. I now make that motion.

Mr. McMILLAN. A motion is pending which I have already submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota has submitted the first motion, which is to proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I want also to say that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is confined to his bed and sent word by a messenger to me to ask the Senator from Wisconsin to allow the bill to go over until he could be present.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not think that is a good reason. I am aware that the Senator from Vermont has given a great deal of attention to this case.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not ask it on my account; but I think under such circumstances the Senator would not insist upon taking up the bill when he knows that the Senator from Kansas does not feign sickness, but is absolutely sick and confined to his bed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. All the time that the Senator from Vermont has been able to take from the consideration of the tariff question he has devoted to the Ben Holladay claim; and I am confident that he can state in half an hour every objection that can be made to the passage of the bill. I think that the absence of the Senator from Kansas really ought not to suspend the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will ask my friend from Minnesota not to call up the river and harbor bill until two o'clock.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill now. There have been quite a number of applications made to lay it aside for other business. Yielding in one case would imply yielding in all. I think the bill will take precedence as an appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I cannot of course stand in the way of the bill represented by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I want to know if the Senator from Minnesota expects to continue the consideration of the river and harbor bill after the morning hour expires.

Mr. McMILLAN. We will continue it until it is disposed of. I hope to get through with the bill to-day. I suppose it will not take more than to-day, or perhaps part of to-morrow.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Pembina bill is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is the unfinished business, and of course it will be disposed of some time or other.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce ought to press the river and harbor bill in the morning hour. It is only printed this morning and we have not had time to look over it. I do not know what it contains; I have not had time to read it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the question be put on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to take up the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 1960) authorizing the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad to construct bridges over the channel of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain; and

A bill (S. No. 1549) for the relief of William J. Pollock.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 209) to authorize the President of the United States to call an international conference to fix on and recommend for universal adoption a common prime meridian to be used in the reckoning of longitude and in the regulation of time throughout the world, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 62) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Terre Haute, Indiana;

A bill (S. No. 750) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana;

A bill (S. No. 1045) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Crow Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana, required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; and

A bill (S. No. 1875) for the erection of a public building at Harrisonburgh and Abingdon, State of Virginia.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce be disposed of as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the amendments of the Committee on Commerce be read along with the paragraphs in which they occur, and that they be disposed of before any other amendments are offered to the bill. That order will be taken unless objection is made now. The Chair hearing none, that will be the order.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before the Secretary proceeds to read the bill I wish to say that as it came from the House it appropriated for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country $17,367,875. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate in examining and considering the bill have added to that amount $2,096,100, making a total of $19,463,975.

Some of the principal items of this increase I will call to the attention of the Senate, that they may discover the distribution of this amount.

The appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River, under the direction and supervision of the Mississippi River commission, to be applied from the head of the passes of that river to Cairo, is increased $877,000, making the appropriation in this bill for that portion of the river $5,000,000.

There is an increase in the appropriation for the Missouri River of $100,000 for the improvement of that river from its mouth to Sioux City, and an increase of $15,000 for the surveying of the river from the mouth to Fort Benton.

There is an increase of $35,000 appropriated to the canal at the Cascades of the Columbia River, and to the Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers, from Portland to the sea, an increase of $25,000.

There is in the appropriation for the examination and survey and incidental repairs of the harbors an increase of $50,000, at the request of the Chief of Engineers, who represented to the committee the fact that it was necessary that that increase should be made.

To the waters in the harbor of New York and the different harbors and rivers in that State there is an increase in the aggregate of $107,000.

To the harbors on the shores of Lake Michigan there is an increase of $102,000.

To the Wilmington River and Harbor, in Delaware, there is an increase of $10,000, making the appropriation there $50,000.

To the harbor at Calumet, in the State of Illinois, there is an increase of $15,000.

To the harbor of Wilmington, in California, there is an increase of $50,000, and for a harbor of refuge at Wood's Holl, Massachusetts, $52,000.

These are some of the principal items of appropriation in the increases of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

There is one other appropriation which I will now mention, which is a new item inserted in the bill, authorizing the Secretary of War "to survey, lay out, and construct a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, with a branch canal or feeder from the most practicable and convenient point on Rock River to the most practicable and convenient point on the main line of said canal," and for this work the committee propose to appropriate $100,000.

This will give to the Senate a fair idea of the items of increase. It will be observed that they have all been directed to important improvements upon the coast of the Atlantic and the Pacific and the great and important harbors of the lakes and the principal rivers of the country. I now ask the Secretary to proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know in advance, is the formal reading of the bill dispensed with, and are the committee amendments to be acted on first?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir; as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. BECK. And then after they are acted on, any other amendments will be in order?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir; that order was made at my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) That is the order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In the event of the amendments offered by the committee being adopted, I ask the Senator whether it will be in order to amend the amendments afterward, or whether he wishes Senators to offer amendments as they pass along?

Mr. McMILLAN. After the amendments of the committee are disposed of, the bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will it be in order to amend those amendments afterward?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from West Virginia to ask whether, if the amendments of the committee are adopted, those amendments can be amended in any particular. They cannot be.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. So I supposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to an amendment must be moved at the time the question is pending on an amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That was my understanding, and I want to have that understood generally.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was, in line 28, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Plymouth, Massachusetts, continuing improvement," from $5,000 to $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 38:

Improving harbor and breakwater at Block Island, Rhode Island: Continuing improvement, $19,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 69, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Great Sodus Bay, New York, continuing improvement," from $20,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 71, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Little Sodus Bay, New York, continuing improvement," from $20,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 79, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Oswego, New York, continuing improvement and enlargement of harbor," from $50,000 to $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 80:

Improving Oak Orchard Harbor, New York, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 85, to insert:

Improving Gowanus Bay: Continuing improvement, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 88, after "New York," to strike out "continuing" and insert "completing;" and in line 89, after the word "improvement," to strike out "three" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Port Jefferson, New York: Completing improvement, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 92:

Improving Sumpawanus Inlet, Long Island, New York, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 123, to insert:

Improving Saint Jones River, in the State of Delaware: Continuing improvement, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 128, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Wilmington, Delaware, deepening the channel and improving Christiana River from the Delaware River to Wilmington," from $40,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 137, to insert:

Improving harbor at Annapolis, Maryland, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 147, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Brunswick, Georgia, continuing improvement," from $15,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 149.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand that it will be in order to move amendments after the committee amendments are through?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 203, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Also the sum of $20,000 for constructing a steam-dredge to be used in executing said work.

So as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at Michigan City, Indiana: Continuing operations at inner harbor, $20,000; continuing operations at outside harbor, $60,000. Also the sum of $20,000 for constructing a steam-dredge to be used in executing said work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 207, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to read:

Improving harbor at Calumet, Illinois: Continuing improvement, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 207, to insert:

Provided, That with a view to the improvement of the Calumet River, in the State of Illinois, from its mouth to the Fork at Calumet Lake, the Secretary of War shall appoint a board of engineers who shall examine said river and report upon the practicability and the best method of perfecting and maintaining a channel for through navigation to said Fork at Lake Calumet, adapted to the passage of the largest vessels navigating the Northern and Northwestern Lakes, limiting and locating the lines of channel to be improved by the United States, and of docks that may be constructed by private individuals, corporations, or other parties, and clearly defining the same under the direction of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army; and the Secretary of War shall report to Congress the result of said examination, and the estimated cost of the proposed improvement; also what legislation, if any, is necessary to prevent encroachments being made or maintained within the limits of the channel designated as above provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 239, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Black Lake, Michigan, continuing operations," from $4,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 246, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Frankfort, Michigan, continuing improvement," from $10,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 252, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used in dredging the bar in the middle of the harbor;" so as to make the clause read:

Harbor of refuge at Lake Huron, Michigan: Continuing operations, $75,000, of which $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used in dredging the bar in the middle of the harbor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 259, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Manistee, Michigan, continuing improvement," from $10,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 269, to insert "improving mouth and harbor of Cedar River, Michigan, continuing improvement," $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 274, to increase the appropriation for "harbor of refuge at Portage Lake, Michigan, continuing improvement," from $20,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 280, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Saugatuck, Michigan, continuing improvement," from $5,000 to $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 282, after the word "dollars," to insert, "and $3,000 for removing obstructions in and dredging channel of river to railroad bridge;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving harbor at South Haven, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $7,000. And $3,000 for removing obstructions in and dredging channel of river to railroad bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 314, to increase the appropriation for "dredging Superior Bay, Wisconsin, continuing operations," from $35,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 325, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Duluth, Minnesota, continuing improvement," from $40,000 to $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 333, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at Wilmington, California, continuing improvement," from $75,000 to $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 352, to insert:

For construction of a harbor of refuge at Wood's Holl, Massachusetts, $52,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 361, to strike out "Saybrook Bar" and insert "the channel of Salmon River;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Connecticut River, Connecticut: Continuing improvement below Hartford, $45,000, $5,000 of which for the improvement of the channel of Salmon River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 436, to insert:

Improving Indian River, in the State of Delaware, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 467, after the word "from," to strike out "lead mines in Wythe" and insert "mouth of Wilson, in Grayson;" and in line 469, after the word "River," to strike out "and from mouth of Greenbrier up, and for continuation of work from lead mines down;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving New River, Virginia and West Virginia: Continuing improvement from mouth of Wilson, in Grayson County, to mouth of Greenbrier River, $12,000, of which sum $5,000 shall be expended between the lead mines in Wythe County and the mouth of Wilson, in Grayson County.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 500, to insert:

Continuing the improvement of the Little Kanawha River, in West Virginia: To complete lock and dam, as estimated for by engineers, $31,000: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be expended until the Little Kanawha Improvement Company shall have filed with the Secretary of War, to be approved by him, its agreement not to charge, in any manner, any tolls for this improved navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in lines 512 and 513, to increase the appropriation for "improving Cape Fear River from the ocean to Wilmington, North Carolina, continuing improvement," from $140,000 to $225,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I notice that for the improvement of rivers and harbors in North Carolina there have been five amendments reported increasing the appropriations as they came from the House, and six that are new and additional. I should like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce the reason for increasing this above the appropriation made by the House. One hundred and forty thousand dollars was proposed by the House, and the committee have offered an amendment making it $225,000. Now, unless there are sufficient reasons for this large increase in a bill of the magnitude of this which is now before the Senate, I think we had better husband some of our resources, and try if possible even to diminish the amount proposed by the House.

Mr. McMILLAN. The amounts recommended by the engineers for the improvements in North Carolina are contained in the report of the engineers in possession of the Senate. In addition, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] has other reports from the Chief of Engineers in addition to those contained in the regular volume. The improvements in North Carolina seem to have been omitted somewhat in the House bill, and the attention of the committee was called to this omission, and upon looking at the reports in the volume before us and the additional reports furnished us we deemed it but just to the improvements which should be made there that the amendments should be made, and especially this amendment as to Cape Fear River.

The Senator from North Carolina I know has some more detailed information in regard to these particular items than I can give, for that is his State, but so far as the reports are concerned in the regular volume and the additional reports from the Chief of Engineers, I think the Senate will find that they present entirely satisfactory reasons for the amendments.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I only desire to say that I am sure the Senator from Vermont will be satisfied when he hears that this amendment is $75,000 less than the amount stated as necessary by the engineer, who is a most skillful and economical one, none more so in this country, Colonel Craighill of the Army. The amendment is $75,000 less than the sum which he and the War Department, acting through the Engineer Corps, say is necessary for the continuation of this improvement.

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer to have a vote of the Senate upon this question to see whether it is possible that any reduction can be made. I see here, as I stated at first, that nearly all the appropriations for North Carolina are increased, and six more items are added.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before the question is put I desire to read from the report of the Chief of Engineers, part 1, page 149, the money statement in regard to Cape Fear River:

Amount (estimated) required for completion of existing project	$410,000
Amount that can be profitably expended in fiscal year ending June 30, 1883	300,000

Upon that statement we thought the amendment was a reasonable one. The small amount appropriated to this item and the omission of some others which were recommended by the engineer seemed to commend the amendments to the favor of the committee, and, I think, will commend them to the Senate.

Mr. RANSOM. I am very much obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce for the very clear statement he has made in reference to the improvement at Wilmington in reply to what the Senator from Vermont had just said, and I will remark that the amendments on this bill for improvements on North Carolina's harbors and streams appear to be large, but an examination of the bill will satisfy Senators that the bill came from the House with but very small appropriations, and with but few appropriations for my State. I hope the Senate will remember that North Carolina has a very extended sea-coast running from the Virginia to the South Carolina line, and that it is one of the most dangerous coasts of this country; that it has the Roanoke River, the Tar River, the Neuse River, and the Cape Fear River running from the ocean two hundred or three hundred miles into the interior, and that it has Currituck Sound, Albemarle Sound, Pamlico Sound, and bays without number?

I do not care to detain the Senate a long time over this amendment. I simply again say to the Senator from Vermont that there are no two points on the coast north or south, on the Atlantic or the Pacific, more important to the shipping of his own section of the country than Beaufort Harbor and Wilmington Harbor. They are harbors of refuge for all the disabled vessels that meet with trouble on Cape Hatteras. But I feel that it is unnecessary to detain the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont surely does not remember the experience some Senators have had in this body in encountering the Senator from North Carolina on questions of the improvement of the rivers, and harbors, and sounds, and bays, and inlets of that famous and disastrous coast; otherwise he would not have ventured, I think, to dissent from this amendment.

The Senator from North Carolina says, and says correctly too, that this bill came into the Senate with a smaller allowance of appropriations for that State than we have been in the habit of seeing appropriations heretofore made. He has with commendable zeal and faithfulness in the representation of his State moved for various amendments, and has increased the sum total of this bill very considerably. But it is hardly worth while to controvert with the Senator from North Carolina on a question of this sort. I remember distinctly well when the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on one occasion entered the lists with the Senator from North Carolina, and went to the dust; and then again the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] who was at the time chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, undertook on one occasion to restrain the honorable Senator from North Carolina in his demands for increased appropriations, and he bit the dust; and I had the misfortune on one occasion also to encounter him upon this same subject, and I went down; and I have come to the conclusion that the Senate will consult economy of time by granting to the Senator from North Carolina pretty much all that he demands.

The Senator says the bill came in here from the House with a very small allowance. It seems to have been very considerably increased now, and I have no doubt very properly increased so far as the people of North Carolina are concerned. I do not know whether that increase is of advantage to the general commerce of the United States or not.

The Senator's success on this subject, however, reminds me of an affair that occurred in Alabama that is mentioned in the celebrated historical romance called Life and Adventures of Simon Suggs.

It will be remembered that the great experimenter upon moral ideas went to a camp-meeting in Alabama for the purpose chiefly of improving his temporal fortunes. While there by some mistake or other, I suppose it was, he embraced religion, and thinking that it was not altogether according to his way of doing business to have merely one good thing at a time, desiring to improve as the Senator from North Carolina always does all opportunities that are afforded to him, after he embraced religion, and under the enthusiasm of his new zeal, carried around the hat and took up a collection among the brethren and sisters for the purpose of building a church in his neighborhood. He got quite a considerable collection and then he went out to a clay-root in the neighborhood and got on his knees and implored the Lord to give him directions what he should do with it. Before he got up from his meditations and prayers he concluded that the best thing he could do was to pocket the fund, whereupon he came back and announced to the congregation that he had had remarkable success in his struggles with the Lord and had received direct information as to what he was to do with this money; but he was a little indisposed to communicate to the congregation precisely what he intended to do with it, and he said he would pass that question over to a future time and to future consideration. He turned around and, soliloquizing with himself, said he, "Simon, you are a success; you went in on nary a pair and you won a pile." [Laughter.] So the Senator from North Carolina gets in here from the House with nary a pair, and he always goes out with a pile.

I shall not oppose anything that the Senator from North Carolina hereafter demands for that afflicted State. I notice that in the French Broad item from Smith's bridge up there is an appropriation of some thousands of dollars, perhaps five or ten. I do not stop to count how many thousands, because I knew he would get it anyhow, it makes no difference what I might do.

I had the ill fortune while a soldier in the confederate army to camp once at Smith's bridge, and it was in a very navigable stage of the water in French Broad River. It was in the month of February when the tides are generally pretty high in these mountain streams, and there was no man who was riding the smallest mule in my command that did not have the greatest ease possible in fording French Broad River above Smith's bridge. Whether the bridge is there yet I do not know. I suppose we shall have to put a draw on that bridge the next thing we do, or perhaps the honorable Senator from North Carolina can inform me whether the bridge is washed away or has been removed.

Mr. RANSOM. I remember that the Senator's cavalry went across that river.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; and in the midst of our haste we scarcely wetted our legs above our boots in crossing the French Broad above Smith's bridge. I have no concern about this matter except to know what has become of that bridge. I should like to know, if the Senator will inform me, whether Smith's bridge is there and whether there is to be a draw put in it to accommodate the navigation of the French Broad?

Mr. RANSOM. I should be a very bad man not to thank my friend from Alabama for the kind words he has spoken of me and I know he did not mean to disparage North Carolina. I suppose he imagines that there is some fitness in what he has said; but if the Senator would take the time to look at the water resources of North Carolina, if he would take a few minutes to look at the map of the State——

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator include the mineral water resources?

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir; I might also include the mineral water resources of North Carolina, for they are very great; but I did not allude to them at that time. If the Senator would just look at the map and see what North Carolina is, with 53,000 square miles and a population of a million and a half of people, one of the oldest settled States in the Union, with four great streams flowing from her bosom to the sea, and as I said before, four or five large sounds, and numberless bays and a long line of sea-coast; with her productions of corn, wheat, cotton, tar, pitch, turpentine, rice, naval stores, lumber, timber—as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] says—peanuts or ground peas, tobacco, sweet potatoes, water melons, vegetables, fruits, everything and all things. I have been told by the head of the Census Bureau that there is not one agricultural production in the census tables which North Carolina does not make, that there is not a blank line in the census opposite North Carolina, raising as she does all the productions of the North and all the productions of the South, from rice and cotton to wheat and corn, from sugar to ice.

Mr. President, it has been the custom of the Senate, and it has been the custom of the House, for many years, on account of the mere use of a little expression some fifty years ago, to criticise the waterways of North Carolina. I should do myself, and I should do the State injustice, if I were to undertake at this late day to answer such suggestions about that State. I shall certainly attempt no eulogy of her to-day. There she stands, the earliest State in this Union to declare her independence of the mother country, and without disparaging any other State in the Union, her people are the most law-abiding, the most orderly in this country, industrious, honest, sober, frugal, minding their own business and letting other people's alone; honorable, conscientious, truthful in all things, at all times, and never selfish or unpatriotic for any purpose; and to-day she is here and asks the Senate for a modest appropriation to develop her great resources. I would not utter a word of discrimination against other States, but I will remind my kind friend from Alabama that if he will look over the list and examine the appropriations which have been granted to other States he will, I know, not find any fault because of the action of the Committee on Commerce toward North Carolina.

Mr. MORGAN. I only want to put this proposition to the honorable Senator: inasmuch as he boasts rightfully that North Carolina was the first to declare her independence of the British rule, I hope she will be the first to declare her independence of the United States Treasury, and rely on her great resources for improving her own streams.

Mr. MORRILL. North Carolina has so many virtues that I think she will be ready to consent to the same appropriation that we made last year for this object. That was $140,000 for this identical improvement.

Mr. RANSOM. Does the Senator from Vermont expect North Carolina to be the Rip Van Winkle of this Union? Does he not wish that State to improve, to advance, to do something for herself and something for the country?

Mr. MORRILL. I think if we make the same appropriation that we made last year, which was a very liberal one, we shall discharge our full duty to North Carolina, and that she will be entirely content. I therefore insist upon a division of the Senate on the question of continuing this appropriation as it was sent to us by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 37, noes not counted.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 513, to insert:

Improving Cape Fear River from Wilmington to Fayetteville, North Carolina, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 517, to increase the appropriations for "improving Cententnia Creek, North Carolina, continuing improvement," from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. That should be "Contentia" Creek, instead of "Cententnia."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 517, to insert:

Improving Yadkin River, North Carolina, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 522, to insert:

Improving Beaufort Harbor, North Carolina: Continuing improvement, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 526, after the word "improvement," to insert "from Smith's bridge up;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving French Broad River, North Carolina: Continuing improvement from Smith's bridge up, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 527, to insert:

Improving New River, North Carolina, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 531, to insert:

Improving Meherin River, North Carolina, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 535, to increase the appropriation for "improving Neuse River, North Carolina, continuing improvement," from $5,000 to $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 535, to insert:

Improving Roanoke River, North Carolina, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 539, to increase the appropriation for "improving Pamplico and Tar Rivers, North Carolina, continuing improvement," from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 541, to increase the appropriation for "improving Trent River, North Carolina, continuing improvement," from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 546, to insert:

Improving Santee River, South Carolina: Continuing improvement, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 575, to insert:

Improving the Savannah River above the city of Augusta: To continue improvement, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 590, to increase the appropriation for "improving Choctawhatchee River, Florida and Alabama, continuing improvement up to Newton, Alabama," from $12,000 to $20,000.

Mr. CALL. I desire the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to consent to a division of that appropriation. Instead of having it, as is proposed, one sum of $20,000, I would ask that it be divided so as to appropriate $8,000 for the channel from the mouth of the river up to Freeport, Florida, leaving the other $12,000 to stand as the House provided, up to the town of Newton, in Alabama. I would divide the appropriation and give the $8,000 increase to opening the channel from the mouth of the Choctawhatchee River to the town of Freeport. I will state that there is a town there which is the entrepôt of a considerable commerce and trade in timber and cotton, and a trade to some extent with foreign countries, furnishing a portion of the timber that goes to Pensacola for shipment abroad. They are not able to conduct that commerce with convenience, or with safety, or with economy, because of the obstructions in the channel at this little town.

I ask, therefore, that $8,000 be appropriated to open the channel at the mouth of the Choctawhatchee River. It is a wide bay, and a very shallow one in portions of it; and at the mouth of it is the most considerable town, I believe, along its whole extent, the town of Freeport.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let the Senator's amendment be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. After the word "improving," in line 588, it is proposed to insert "mouth of," and after the word "river," to insert "up to the town of Freeport, $8,000;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving mouth of Choctawhatchee River up to the town of Freeport, $8,000; continuing improvement up to Newton, Alabama, $12,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I object to that. The amount appropriated for the Choctawhatchee by the House bill and by the Senator's amendment is less than one-half the amount of the estimates. The estimate for that improvement from Pensacola Bay up to Geneva is $25,000, and the total amount appropriated is only $20,000. The House bill only put in about one-half of the estimate. The Choctawhatchee River runs through a populated country which is without any means of transportation, rail or water, except the Choctawhatchee River; it has a great many capabilities for agricultural production, and I insist upon the amendment made by the committee. If the Senator from Florida desires an amount provided for the part of the river he asks for, let him propose it separately.

Mr. VEST. The amendment only divides the appropriation; it does not decrease the appropriation for the Choctawhatchee River.

Mr. PUGH. I object to the division.

Mr. VEST. The amount remains the same.

Mr. PUGH. I wish the appropriation devoted to clearing out the river from Geneva to Newton. There has never been any work on that river except there.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is in accordance with the recommendation of the engineer. Geneva and Newton are the points mentioned in his report. I do not know where the other locality is. I think it better to adhere to the recommendations of the engineer, and to retain the clause as it is.

Mr. PUGH. This appropriation is in accordance with the estimate and recommendation of the engineer, and I object to disturbing it.

Mr. CALL. I have a word to say about that. The Senator is entirely wrong in his geography and in all the facts of the case except that the engineer does report that it will take $25,000 properly expended at the headwaters of this river to open navigation to Geneva. I do not object to that appropriation. I think it very proper. The Choctawhatchee River, running into Choctawhatchee Bay, at its mouth is a large stream. When it gets up to Geneva it becomes a little river, scarcely navigable at all and only at particular seasons of the year, but still it may be made eminently useful. At the mouth of the Choctawhatchee River, where it enters into the Gulf of Mexico, is a harbor some miles up, the bay being a long wide reach of water extending for a considerable distance along the coast of Florida, and being a sound upon which a large portion of the heavy timber which constitutes the great foreign commerce of Pensacola is transported.

The bill appropriates $20,000 to open this river where it has become a small and almost obscure stream, and we simply ask, giving them $12,000 for that purpose, that $8,000 shall be appropriated to open the channel to the actual seaport, having an entrance into the sea at the mouth of the Choctawhatchee River and around Choctawhatchee Bay, which rests upon one of the little streams that run into it.

I do not think the Senator from Alabama, whose State is only embraced in this river when it becomes a little stream needing to be opened for the purposes of navigation, ought to object to a division of this appropriation so that a portion of it shall go to the seaport at the mouth of the river. That leaves $12,000 for the upper part of the stream, where it is scarcely a river at all, and all we ask for the legitimate purposes of the commerce of the sea-coast at the mouth of this river is $8,000. The whole extent of the river where it is a real river, three-quarters of a mile wide, is in the State of Florida; and the only port on the Choctawhatchee River from its mouth to its source, with the exception of the little town of Geneva, which is just within the borders of Alabama—the only town of any considerable extent anywhere connected with the waters of the Choctawhatchee River is Freeport, to which I have referred.

Mr. CONGER. It is safe probably in making these appropriations to make them in accordance with the reports and estimates of the engineers. This appropriation is made on the report and estimate of the engineers for the purpose mentioned in the bill, for improving the river Choctawhatchee from Geneva to Newton. The engineer's report says:

> The amount expended to June 30, 1881, is $27,367.38, and has resulted in making navigation as far up as Geneva comparatively safe, 140 miles on this section of the river having been improved. No work was done between Geneva and Newton.
> The appropriation of $25,000 asked for is to be applied to clearing the river of all snags, stumps, and overhanging trees, from the mouth to Geneva, and to the removal of the remainder of the wreck of a steamer, and to obtaining a high-water channel from Geneva toward Newton, as far as the appropriation will permit.

The committee think it a safe rule where we make an appropriation on the recommendation and estimates of the engineers to make it correspond with the plan and estimate, and to make it as far as may be in the language of the plan and of the estimate, which the committee have followed in this case. I think it is unsafe to change the wording of the appropriation, because it ought to be made with reference to the plans and estimates, if made at all. I should hope there might be no change in the proposed plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. This appropriation leaves it at the discretion of the engineers to apply this sum on this river up to Newton. There is no restriction whatever in the appropriation; the engineers can dispose of this money as they see proper from the mouth of the river up to Newton, and we had better leave it to their discretion and not interfere with them by dividing the amount and placing a limitation upon the engineers as to the manner in which they shall expend it. As the Senators from Florida and Alabama differ upon this matter, I think the Senate had better retain the appropriation as it is.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to state that no part of the appropriation heretofore made has ever been expended except on the river from Geneva to Newton.

Mr. McMILLAN. So the engineers state distinctly in their report.

Mr. PUGH. Not one dollar. This river runs for about sixty miles into Alabama and through a good country, but those people are without any means of transportation whatever, water or rail, and I simply ask (and that was the object of the increase by the committee) that the Senate give us enough to secure us some navigation upon that river.

Mr. MAXEY. You are satisfied with the amendment of the committee?

Mr. PUGH. I am, and object to the change.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate further to the report of the engineers on this subject, which I think explains the matter so fully that we need have no doubt about the propriety of the manner in which the appropriation is to be applied:

> The commerce in the country along the Upper Choctawhatchee River, from Geneva to Newton, and above Newton, consists principally of cotton, corn, oats, and fruit, very little being done in the timber business. About 8,000 bales of cotton are annually shipped from Newton, and these, as well as necessary plantation supplies, have to be hauled to and from Chattahoochee, Eufaula, or Troy, a distance of from fifty to seventy miles.
> No work having been done on the improvement of the river above Geneva, no increase in trade has taken place, but it is estimated that by improving the river for high-water navigation to Newton, Newton will be the shipping point for a radius of country of from forty to fifty miles, and that from 25,000 to 30,000 bales of cotton will be shipped from that county annually.
> The supply of corn, provisions, guano, and plantation supplies, &c., will be proportionate to the number of bales of cotton raised. As a consequence of the improvement made during the last six years, and particularly so during the last working season, three steamboats and a barge were put in the trade between Pensacola and Geneva, and a steam-launch, a large barge, several schooners, sloops, and flats in the Holmes Valley trade.

The engineer goes on to give a very excellent account of the results of this improvement upon the Choctawhatchee River. Now, I submit to the Senator from Florida that if this appropriation is allowed to be expended under the care of the engineers as it is, without any restriction of so much for one section of the river and so much for another, expense will be saved, and the engineer can have a more intelligent idea of the relief that ought to be given to the navigation of this river.

I hope that the Senator will not insist that the appropriation shall be divided into two sections, because there is no conflict between Florida and Alabama about this matter. Alabama has the same interest that Florida has in keeping open the mouth of the river. It is useless to have navigation from Newton to Geneva, unless the mouth of the river is open. Of course the engineers will see to that in the expenditure of the appropriation, that steamboats which may run up as high as Newton will have free access to the Choctawhatchee Bay, and from that down to Pensacola.

Mr. CALL. If the Senators from Alabama and the chairman of the committee will consent to insert such language as will give the engineer discretion in applying any part of this money to opening the channel to Freeport, at the mouth of the river, I shall be content to leave it in his discretion; but as it now stands he has no such discretion.

The Choctawhatchee River flows into the sound or bay of Choctawhatchee, and vessels go thence to Pensacola. It is not a trade which goes upon the Gulf. The vessels that enter into Choctawhatchee Bay must travel along the sound to Pensacola. At the mouth of that river there is a small town called Freeport, upon a bayou connected with the bay, not strictly upon the river nor upon the bay, but on a little bayou or deep cut, a tide-water creek running to it. Holmes Valley is similar to it, and Freeport and Holmes Valley are the outlets for a considerable trade.

As the bill stands no part of the money can be applied to the improvement of the only settled portions on that river, except when you get away up into Alabama, where there is scarcely any river; no part of this money can be applied for the benefit of Freeport or of Holmes Valley. If you leave it in the discretion of the engineer by inserting such language as will enable him to apply any part of the money appropriated for the Choctawhatchee River to the lower part of the river, I am content; but as it stands I call attention to the fact that all that portion of the Choctawhatchee River which is on this lower section and empties into the bay is excluded from the advantage of the appropriation.

Mr. MORGAN. I confess I do not see any language of exclusion in these words:

> Improving Choctawhatchee River, Florida and Alabama: Continuing improvement up to Newton, Alabama, $20,000.

There are no words of exclusion there.

Mr. CALL. The fact is that there is nobody upon Choctawhatchee River in Florida. The settlements are on the little bayous off the river. For instance, you would have to say, "Improving Choctawhatchee River, including the channel or bayou to Freeport, and including the channel to Holmes Valley." The river is a wide stream running through great swamps, and only here and there is there to be found land inhabitable upon which people live. It is off the river, upon these cuts, bayous, or channels, that there are settlements, and so far as Florida is concerned the appropriation is of benefit to the commerce of the country in the language here employed.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, what the Senator from Florida wants is instructions in this bill, as I understand, that the engineer shall apply a portion of this money to the making a channel to Freeport.

Mr. CALL. Not at all. As I tell the Senator, the topographical effect of the situation of the country is this: the river is a wide stream running through swamps, and the towns which form settlements upon that river are upon bayous three or four miles off.

Mr. MORGAN. What I wish to do is to leave it to the engineer; put it, as the committee have put it, in the discretion of the engineer to use the money on the Choctawhatchee River.

Mr. CALL. For years this appropriation has been made, and for years not one cent of this money has ever been expended for the benefit of those people living in the immediate vicinity of the river and upon the channels that enter into it, and therefore I ask that the language shall be made definite.

Now, I will state another fact. There is a railroad projected through that country which has been partly built by a donation of the State of Florida, and it runs right along within two miles of the river, and before next fall that railroad will be constructed and ample communication will be furnished for those people, and yet the Senator from Alabama will not allow one dollar of this money to be appropriated for the whole length of Florida, which comprehends all the river that is really of any value.

Mr. PUGH. The railroad about which the Senator speaks is fifty to seventy-five miles south of the country that I wish to get the benefit of this navigation above Geneva. There is no part of the improvement about which he speaks that is considered by the engineer in making this estimate, and if he desires to include it in the work reported by the engineer let him move to amend by raising the amount to $25,000. The amount of the engineer's estimate is $25,000 for this work upon the Choctawhatchee River, mainly for the improvement of the Choctawhatchee above Geneva. I do not wish the estimate of the engineer disturbed. The $8,000 does not approach the estimate that he made as necessary for this work without any reference to what the Senator from Florida desires, and I do not suppose the committee will object upon his statement to raising the amount to the estimate of the engineer for the other work, and if he will offer that amendment I will vote for it, and then I am willing that the phraseology shall be changed; but I cannot consent to divide the $20,000 in the way he wishes, in the face of the fact that it does not come within $5,000 of the estimate of the engineer for the work upon the Choctawhatchee River.

Mr. CALL. If the chairman will agree to it, I will move to increase the amount to $25,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot consent to any increase of the appropriation here. This has been a very liberal appropriation for the improvement proposed by the engineer. The engineer has stated the necessities in regard to this stream and has asked for a certain appropriation. The House of Representatives have sent this bill to us, Representatives there framing this appropriation, because the Senate committee did not frame the appropriation. This comes as the Representatives of those districts have settled it in the House, and I do hope Senators will permit it to stand as it is, because any diversion or change of this language would be without any basis in the report of the engineers, and that we cannot consent to.

I hope the Senator from Florida will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the first motion I made and move to increase the appropriation to $25,000. I wish to state that the chairman of the committee is entirely unadvised in regard to this report, begging his pardon, though very much advised perhaps on other subjects. It is, I believe, the rule with this bill to take away the appropriations from the harbors, from the sea-coast, and deprive them of all benefits under it. I am perfectly willing to vote for all the money that is needed to open the internal communications of the rivers, but I think there ought to be some consideration paid to the foreign commerce of the country, some to the sea-coast. My own State has been largely, I may say entirely neglected in this respect in the bill. I wish to read from the report of the engineers. They propose to improve this river for forty miles above Geneva.

The condition of the river on June 30, 1881, is such that steamers drawing four feet of water can ascend as far as Geneva with comparative safety.

It is above that point, above the four feet of water in the river, that the improvement is proposed to be made. The report does not say one word about the value of the commerce that is to come from above there. I know something about it, and I know it ought to be done, and I am in favor of it; but I have said before that the commerce of this river comes from below, and so the report states, and so the committee must have ascertained. The report says:

Previous to the improvement the annual shipment of cotton down the river—

From where?—

from Walton, Washington, and Holmes Counties, Florida, and Geneva County, Alabama—

There are four points of shipment, Geneva County, Alabama, being just outside of the Florida line—did not exceed fifteen hundred bales, from the fact that only very small steamers and light-draught barges could ply the river, and then only in high-water seasons.

I ask that a part of this money shall be applied, and that such language shall be used as to render it definite, to the counties of Washington, Holmes, and Walton, in Florida, and Geneva, in Alabama, and to the town of Freeport, their port of shipment, instead of the whole of it being applied to Alabama. That is all.

Now, I move that this appropriation be raised, if it meets the sense of the committee, to $25,000.

Mr. CONGER. The general appropriations running through this bill, based on what the engineers consider may be economically used for the year, are cut down to about one-third, sometimes one-half. Where a work can be completed with a moderate appropriation, it is put in in full; but in almost all cases the appropriations are about 33 per cent. of the engineer's estimates. Now, the proposition is to increase this item to the full amount on a stream which must have additional appropriations, for the estimate is for larger appropriations from year to year. The committee found that the House appropriated $12,000 for this river. They found it led into a country where there was but little communication by rail and not much advantage for shipping away the products of that country, as in many other parts of the Union, by rail, and after considering the matter they added $8,000 to the appropriation.

I think if we commence putting in this bill appropriations up to the amount which the engineers suggest can be economically used we shall have a bill somewhat exceeding $40,000,000. It is for the Senate to consider whether it is best to do that. Here is a work that is going on; the work seems to have been very successful. There is no estimate and no recommendation for any appropriation at the mouth of this river, and, as I said before, I do not think it safe by specifications in the bill to declare that the engineers shall expend the money which we appropriate where they have made no survey, no estimate, and no plans. Of course the adding of $5,000 here or there is not material except to conform to what seemed to the committee, and I trust will seem to the Senate, to be some reasonable limits in the amount of the appropriations made in the bill.

I have no choice about it except that the appropriation shall be made in accordance with the plans and estimates, and not be diverted to places where there has been no survey and no plan and no estimate, as the Senator from Florida suggests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 14, no quorum voting.

Mr. PLATT. There is a quorum in the Senate, evidently.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks there is a quorum in the Senate. The Chair will put the question again.

The question being again put, there were on a division ayes 18, noes 25. So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce, in line 590.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 611, to insert:

For improving the roadstead which leads into the Back Bay of Biloxi, on the Mississippi Sound, according to survey and estimate made, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 633, to insert:

For removing obstructions at mouth of Bayou La Fourche, and improving said bayou from its mouth to a point twenty-four miles below Lockport, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 648, to insert:

Continuing improvement of Bayou Teche from Saint Martinsville to Port Barre, Louisiana, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 664, before the word "improvement," to strike out "continuing" and insert "complete;" and after the word "improvement" to strike out "50,000" and insert "94,500;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving ship-channel in Galveston Bay, Texas: Complete improvement, $94,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. That should be "to complete improvement." The word "to" should be inserted before "complete."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 685, to insert:

Improving White River, Arkansas, above Buffalo Shoals: Completing improvement, $12,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 691, to insert:

Improving Current River, in Arkansas and Missouri, from Doniphan to its mouth, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 709, to insert:

For continuing the improvement of Red River, a tributary of the Cumberland, in Tennessee, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 745, to increase the appropriation for "improving Detroit River, Michigan, continuing improvement," from $50,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for "improving Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, Wisconsin," after the word "available," in line 779, to insert:

And $3,000 of this appropriation, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended above Portage City, to prevent the overflow of the Wisconsin River into the Upper Fox River, so as to prevent injury to the Government works on Fox River; and this expenditure may be made separately, or, if deemed more economical by the Secretary of War, in adding to any protecting works which may be made by the State of Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, before the word "Wisconsin," in line 789, to insert "Minnesota and;" and in line 790, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Saint Croix River below Taylor's Falls, Minnesota and Wisconsin: Continuing improvement, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "reservoirs at headwaters of Mississippi River," after the word "sustained," in line 831, to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the land so to be taken during the time the same may be used for the purpose herein stated.

Mr. BECK. I should like to hear from the Senator from Minnesota about this question of "Reservoirs at the headwaters of Mississippi River: Continuing operations, $300,000." Does anybody suppose that is going to aid the navigation of the Mississippi River below the Falls of Saint Anthony in any form? I have always looked upon that as one of the matters that I should like more information about, believing that there is no sort of practicability in it. It will be an enormously expensive affair, and the idea of affecting the river below the Falls of Saint Anthony by any system of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi seems to me, if not ridiculous, certainly very near it. There may be information that I have not got as to that item in the bill. With no desire to disparage improvements in that northwestern country, I should like to hear some explanation of the item.

Mr. McMILLAN. I suppose the Senator from Kentucky is aware of the fact that when General Warren was in charge of the river and harbor improvements of the district embracing the Mississippi River through the State of Minnesota a survey was made of the headwaters of the Mississippi for the purpose of ascertaining what effect these reservoirs would have upon the navigation of the river. After his survey was made and the calculations were all made and reported to the Secretary of War and communicated to Congress, his report shows that he is decidedly in favor of this improvement and believes that it will benefit navigation. Colonel Farquhar, who succeeded him, made a most careful calculation and survey of the same ground and waters, and made his report to the War Department, which is communicated to Congress, emphasizing the opinion of General Warren, going into details, and giving an opinion which certainly should be considered as having great weight, because he is one of the principal engineers in the Army, in favor of the same measure, recommending this improvement upon the ground of its benefit to the navigation of the Mississippi River.

The present engineer in charge of that district of the public improvements has made still further surveys and more detailed examinations and has made very full and accurate reports on the subject, sustaining the positions of his predecessors, and going further he thinks it will affect most favorably the navigation of the Mississippi River far below the mouth of the Saint Croix to the head of Lake Pepin.

These reports have all been in the possession of Congress; they have been called to the attention of Congress heretofore when an appropriation was made for the purpose; and if the opinions of the engineers are of any weight at all, there seems to be no doubt about the fact that this improvement will add very materially to the navigation of the Mississippi River down to Lake Pepin, affecting it most favorably at Saint Paul and below that region, giving good navigation throughout the year.

Mr. BECK. I do not know enough about this matter to make any motion in regard to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I simply desire to interrupt the Senator to say that I have prepared an amendment which I intend to offer when the proper time arrives, striking out this appropriation of $300,000 for reservoirs and inserting an appropriation for continuing observations and surveys; and at the time I offer it I propose to call the attention of the Senate to the report of the Mississippi River commission on this subject of reservoirs in order that we may ascertain exactly the situation. I shall be prepared to show the Senate that in the opinion of that commission there are as yet no sufficient data collected to justify such an appropriation.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it will appear that the Mississippi River commission know nothing about it.

Mr. HARRISON. I dare say that is the opinion of the Senator from Minnesota. I suppose we are not voting on this question now. I did not desire to interrupt anything the Senator from Kentucky might desire to say, but I wished to notify him that I intended to offer such an amendment and to call the attention of the Senate to what has been said by the Mississippi River commission, who were directed by Congress to report upon this subject.

Mr. BECK. I rose only to say that I had not sufficient information to enable me to make any motion in regard to this matter; but a year or two ago when I was at Saint Paul, Minnesota, I went to the office of the engineer—Major Allen, I think, was then in charge—and examined all the maps, plats, and plans, being very anxious to see whether anything could be done in that direction, because suggestions were made of an effort to improve the Ohio River in the same way by reservoirs at the headwaters; and after looking it all over, having gone before that time over one hundred miles up the Mississippi River above the falls, and going again the year after up as far as a man could very well go without wading in many places, I was utterly unable to see, and am to-day utterly unable to understand, how they could do more than to throw water into the Upper Mississippi that will enable saw-logs to float down the Falls of Saint Anthony. Below that I have no idea they will be able to make any impression upon that river by these reservoirs.

This will be—mark what I say—another evidence of the absurd notions that very distinguished persons will sometimes seek to impose upon men who do not know or are not presumed to know as much as they do about matters that belong to them. I may be all wrong; I hope I am; but I think this is the most useless expenditure that could possibly be imagined for any practical purpose. For that reason I asked the question. I have no motion to make.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 863, to insert:

That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the construction of a dry-dock at the Des Moines Rapids Canal, on the Mississippi River, at such site as may be selected thereon by the Secretary of War; said dry-dock to be used for the construction, examination, repairing, and use of boats, dredges, barges, scows, and other vessels of the United States, and the construction, examination, and repair of vessels for private parties, under such regulations and for such compensation as may, from time to time, be fixed and regulated by the Secretary of War; this appropriation to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 876, to insert:

That whenever the Government shall not further use the old dock of the Sault Sainte Marie Canal it shall be converted into a dry-dock for the repair of Government dredges, revenue-cutters, and other craft belonging to the Government, and for other craft belonging to private persons, on such terms as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and for the expense of such construction the amount of $65,000, balance of tolls in the possession of the State of Michigan and offered to the United States for this purpose, be accepted by the United States.

Mr. CONGER. There is a clerical error in the second line of the amendment. The word "dock" should be "lock," in line 878.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 916, to increase the appropriation for "improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa," from $800,000 to $900,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 920, to increase the appropriation for "survey of Missouri River from its mouth to Fort Benton, Montana, continuing the survey," from $25,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 931, after "California," to strike out "continuing" and insert "completing;" and in line 932, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "fourteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Petaluma Creek, California: Completing improvement, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in lines 942 and 943, to increase the appropriation for "constructing canal around Cascades of Columbia River, Oregon, continuing construction," from $265,000 to $300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 949, to increase the appropriation for "improving Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers, Oregon, continuing improvement from Portland, Oregon, to the sea, including bar at mouth of Columbia River," from $75,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 969, after the word "hundred," to insert "and fifty;" and in line 971, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors: Examinations and surveys, and for contingencies, and for incidental repairs of harbors for which there is no special appropriation, $150,000, of which sum $50,000 for surveys and $100,000 for contingencies, including incidental repairs of harbors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 981, after the word "sum," to strike out "five thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving Susquehanna River above and below Havre de Grace, Maryland, $25,000, of which sum $7,500 shall be expended above the bridge, and $5,000 for the completion of the channel to the Fishing Battery light-house, and for strengthening and extending the piers and breakwater for the protection of said channel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 992, to increase the appropriation for "improving harbor at New Buffalo, Michigan," from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 994, to increase the appropriation for "improving Appomattox River, Virginia," from $20,000 to $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1000, to increase the appropriation for "improving Cocheco River, New Hampshire," from $10,000 to $28,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1046, after the word "dollars," to insert "of which amount the sum of $10,000 may be expended in improving the East Neebish;" so as to make the clause read:

Improving the Hay Lake channel of the Sault Sainte Marie River, via the Middle Neebish, $200,000, of which amount the sum of $10,000 may be expended in improving the East Neebish.

Mr. CONGER. After the words "East Neebish," I move to add the word "channel."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 1073, to insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey, lay out, and construct a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, with a branch canal or feeder from the most practicable and convenient point on Rock River to the most practicable and convenient point on the main line of said canal. Said canal and said branch shall not be less than seventy feet wide at the water-line and not less than six feet in depth of water, with locks not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length and twenty-one feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least two hundred and eighty tons burden, and for that purpose the Secretary of War shall have power and authority, by engineers and agents employed by him, to enter upon any lands for the purpose of making the necessary preliminary examinations and surveys, and to enter upon and appropriate to the use of the United States, for the purpose aforesaid, any lands for the construction of such canal and branch, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and other erections and fixtures as may be necessary for the safe and convenient navigation of the said canal and branch.

That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, by skillful engineers of the Army, all necessary examinations and surveys, and from them and surveys already made he shall determine and locate the route of said canal, with a due regard to the permanency of its construction and its greatest advantages for commercial purposes; and the said engineers shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of War a survey, map, and profile of said canal and branch when thus located, and before the work thereon shall be commenced.

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in order to secure the right of way for such canal and branch, to acquire the title to such lands as may be necessary, by agreement, purchase, or voluntary conveyance from the owners, if it can be done on reasonable terms; but if that shall be found impracticable, then the Secretary of War shall apply at any term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois to be held thereafter, at any general or special term held in said district, and in the name of the United States institute and carry on proceedings to condemn such lands as may be necessary for right of way as aforesaid; and the laws of the State of Illinois relating to the subject of condemning private property for public use shall apply to and govern the condemnation of lands for the purposes mentioned in this act; and in such proceedings said courts shall be governed by the laws of the State of Illinois so far as the same may be applicable to the subject of condemning private property for public use.

That the Secretary of War shall cause said canal and branch to be made and constructed upon the land to be taken and appropriated as is hereinbefore provided; and that he shall cause said work to be entered upon and commenced as soon as practicable, and within not exceeding six months after this act goes into effect, and shall cause the same, with all necessary locks or lock-houses, waste-weirs, guard-gates, basins, and bridges, to be constructed and completed, ready for navigation, at the earliest possible day consistent with the public interests; and for that purpose he shall detail a sufficient number of the most skillful and experienced officers from the Corps of Engineers as he may deem best and necessary, who shall superintend and direct said work, under such orders and rules as he may prescribe.

That the Secretary of War, if in his judgment it will be to the interest of the United States, may cause said work, or any part of the same, to be put under contract to the lowest bidder; and in such case he shall invite proposals for any work or any material or labor for any part of said work; and there shall be separate proposals and separate contracts for each work, and also for each class of material or labor for each work; and he shall report to Congress, on the first Monday of December of each year, or as soon thereafter as may be, all the bids, with the names of the bidders, and to whom the contracts for the construction of the work have been awarded: Provided, That no contract shall be made except after public advertisement for proposals in such form and manner as the Secretary of War may direct, and to secure general notice thereof; and the same shall only be made with the lowest responsible bidder therefor, upon security deemed sufficient in the judgment of said Secretary.

That the Secretary of War shall cause said work to be constructed in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of this act, and of the size, depth, and dimensions in every respect specified and set forth therein, which shall be of permanent and substantial material and in good workmanlike manner. The same, and every part thereof, and the locks and waste-weirs, basins, bridges, lock-houses, and other erections and fixtures connected therewith, and to be constructed thereon, shall, at all times and after the same shall be made, be kept and maintained in good order and repair and condition for the use and navigation thereof; and when thus completed the said canal and branch shall be a military, naval, postal, and public highway connecting the waters of Lake Michigan and the Illinois, the Mississippi, and Rock Rivers, and shall be established as such to the United States and the people thereof forever; and no obstructions shall be placed therein which shall impede or interfere with the uninterrupted navigation thereof.

That the Secretary of War shall have power to establish all needful rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, concerning the use and navigation thereof, and provide such penalties for the violation of such rules and regulations as may be deemed expedient; and a copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, and a copy thereof, certified by said clerk under his hand and seal of his office, shall be received in all courts of law as prima facie proof that such rules and regulations were so established; and suits for the violation of such rules and regulations, and to recover such forfeitures, may be prosecuted in said district court, and in any district court of the United States where one of the parties defendant in such suit may reside: Provided, That Congress may at any time revise or abrogate any of such rules and regulations.

That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to the canal connecting the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin with the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island: Provided, That the State of Illinois shall have first surrendered to the United States the improvements made by said State on the Illinois River above Hennepin, and the canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and shall consent to the provisions of this act by act of her Legislature, before this act shall take effect and be operative.

Mr. McMILLAN. After the word "Island," in line 1200, I move to insert "and the branch thereof;" so as to read:

That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to the canal connecting the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin with the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, and the branch thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. Will the chairman of the committee advise us by what general authority a new canal of this sort forms a part of the river and harbor bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know whether the Committee on Commerce regards this as necessarily or properly a part of the river and harbor bill. I ask that because the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard is considering the feasibility of another canal, which has been pressed upon our consideration from time to time, and the Hennepin Canal was considered also in part. If the one project is to be put on the bill very likely the other would come in as part of it. I wish to know how the Committee on Commerce, in dealing with a river and harbor bill, undertakes now to insert a grand canal project costing God knows how much, and allowing the Secretary of War to do as he pleases. I should like some explanation about it. I think it is subject to a point of order, but I want to hear it explained.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it is part of the bill properly, and I suppose it would not be subject to a point of order. During the present session of Congress a separate bill was introduced in the same terms as those embraced in this amendment. It was referred by the order of the Senate to the Committee on Commerce. There was no objection made to that reference by any member of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard or any other person.

Mr. BECK. I beg the Senator's pardon; there was no objection to its going to the Committee on Commerce. I only wish they had had the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal project before them. What I desire to know is why the Committee on Commerce did not submit this as a separate measure to Congress to determine whether it should be done or not, and then in the river and harbor bill make the appropriation necessary to carry out the law that Congress saw fit to pass, if it should pass it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understood the Senator's question to be whether it is in the province of the Committee on Commerce to insert the amendment in the river and harbor bill. As I said, a separate bill for this improvement was introduced in the Senate at this session, and referred to the Committee on Commerce. There was no objection to that reference, and we supposed that of course the matter was properly within our jurisdiction. We considered that bill, and as a separate measure it was reported with a favorable recommendation to the Senate, and is now upon the Calendar. The same measure, having had a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce, was offered as an amendment by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the river and harbor bill. Having acted upon the original bill and made a favorable report, and the subject being under consideration by the Senate, the committee did think that it was proper to insert it as an amendment to the river and harbor bill, because we understand that this improvement does connect the channels of the great lakes with the Mississippi River and with the other navigable waters of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether this contemplated improvement is on the line of some navigable stream?

Mr. McMILLAN. It utilizes a portion of a river as a canal.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it navigable?

Mr. McMILLAN. Oh, yes; a navigable stream, from Chicago out; one of the streams running into Lake Michigan.

Mr. BUTLER. Can the Senator inform us, then, how much of the Hennepin Canal is to be outside of navigable streams?

Mr. McMILLAN. There will be about sixty-five miles of the improvement embraced in the amendment connecting the waters of the lakes, then uninterruptedly, with the waters of the Mississippi River and the great navigable streams of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it proposed to make free navigation through this canal?

Mr. McMILLAN. The provision was inserted by the committee, the original bill having been so amended, that no toll should be collected upon this canal at any time.

Mr. BUTLER. Then may I inquire how the canal is to be maintained?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will read the provision in the pending bill, from line 1285 to line 1288, inclusive:

That no tolls or operating charges whatsoever shall be levied or collected upon any vessel or vessels passing through any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation belonging to the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator to say that the navigation is to be absolutely free?

Mr. McMILLAN. I do.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I should like to inquire how the canal is to be maintained? By an annual appropriation by Congress? By taxation on the whole country?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is to be maintained by the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the Senator any idea of what the annual cost of maintaining it would be?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not advised in regard to the precise amount of the cost. The sum would not be a very considerable one compared with the great benefit that this improvement would be to commerce. The Senator from South Carolina will remember that if this connection is made between the waters of the lakes and the Mississippi River a new channel of communication from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic coast will be opened up and brought into contact and competition with all the lines of railroad crossing this continent, and it will affect materially and favorably the freights on every railroad in the country. The only mode of communication now is from the head of Lake Superior, down that lake and the great chain of lakes to the waters of the East. This brings a communication from the center of the Mississippi Valley and makes connection with the Atlantic coast.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt about that. My inquiry was simply to get information, if I could, from the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am very willing to give the Senator all the information I can.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish information as to what will be the probable cost of the construction of this canal, and then what will be the probable annual cost of the maintenance of the canal. It seems to me before we embark on an enterprise of this kind, some such estimate ought to be furnished to the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator is aware that this is not a very new project.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know how old it is.

Mr. McMILLAN. This project has been very fully and ably considered for many years by the Engineer Department of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. Have the engineers furnished any information?

Mr. McMILLAN. Oh, yes, sir; and the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard considered it fully and particularly, and made a recommendation in its favor very strongly. The Mississippi River conventions from time to time have considered it and recommended it to Congress as one of the most important improvements that could be made. The Legislatures of various States, including the States of Minnesota and Iowa certainly, have passed resolutions instructing their Senators to vote for this measure, and to contribute what they could to its passage.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean to say that it is decided how much the cost of constructing the work or how much the annual expense of maintaining it will be?

Mr. McMILLAN. I have not the knowledge of the precise expense or of the annual cost.

Mr. HOAR. I know, but the Senator is not asked precisely. He is asked as a general opinion how much will it cost to make it and how much will it cost to maintain it, not precisely. Has he any estimates?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will not undertake to say definitely.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator undertake to say indefinitely?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will ask the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] who has the papers, to state more distinctly the amount. He can make the statement better than I can.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator ask for the supposed amount?

Mr. HOAR. I ask for a general idea of the cost of the work and how much it will take annually to maintain it.

Mr. ALLISON. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. VEST. I will only say in regard to the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts that it was stated before the committee that $8,000,000 probably would be the cost.

Mr. ALLISON. There has been a careful estimate of this work, and the engineers estimate the cost to be only $3,900,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. There are but sixty-five miles of canal.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Iowa tell us how much lockage there is in the canal? What is the amount?

Mr. ALLISON. There is a lockage of two hundred and seven feet up and ninety-two feet down. That is all.

Mr. BUTLER. How many locks?

Mr. ALLISON. Nine locks one way and twelve the other.

Mr. BUTLER. They are to be maintained, as I understand, by an annual appropriation of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. To be maintained as all other canals owned by the Government are maintained.

Mr. McMILLAN. The canal at Sault Sainte Marie is maintained in the same way; the canal on the Ohio River at Louisville, and all the canals belonging to the United States are maintained at the expense of the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. The Muscle Shoals and the Columbia River Canals.

Mr. McMILLAN. All the others are maintained at the general expense of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. By annual appropriations?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes. This would be maintained in the same way, because it is for the general purposes of commerce, and will be a great national improvement if it is made. It seems to me that one of the great benefits from this improvement will be the effect that it will have upon the transportation of freight to and from the Atlantic coast. It will affect most favorably that transportation, certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not indicated any opposition to the amendment; I simply want to get information about it. I do not exactly agree with the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota when they say that this will compare with the Muscle Shoals Canal, or with the Kanawha Canal, or any other of those canals which are simply intended to improve the navigation of navigable waters. This canal, I understand, is to be dug through a State, the State of Illinois.

Mr. ALLISON. It is to connect navigable rivers.

Mr. BUTLER. It is to connect navigable rivers, but it is not intended to improve any navigable river; and it may be a very serious question, one which I am not prepared at this time to answer, whether Congress has the constitutional power to do it. I simply desire to get information on the subject.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall not enter into a discussion of that question at this time. It has been very fully considered by the statesmen of the country, not only of this day but of former times, and I think the opinion may be regarded as settled that we have the constitutional power. At least it is so implied in this bill. If we have not, of course that would affect the opinion of Senators in regard to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota, if he will allow me, first, whether nearly every argument he is now making was not made, and made for years, with great emphasis and urgency in behalf of a canal connecting the Mississippi with the lakes, from the mouth of the Wisconsin and the Fox River by Portage City, and whether four or five millions, I do not know how many, but several millions certainly, have not been spent on that improvement, believing Green Bay on the lake and the mouth of the Wisconsin River to be great objective points for all the hauling to the Rocky Mountains on one side and high navigation below the mouth of the Wisconsin on the other, and if after years of work and millions of expenditure that does not now stand a confessed failure?

Mr. McMILLAN. So far as that improvement is concerned, I believe it is still in progress. There is an appropriation in this bill to continue it.

Mr. BECK. An appropriation of $2,000 to keep it from being overflowed. I saw that.

Mr. McMILLAN. I presume the difficulty in regard to that improvement is that a sufficient amount has not been appropriated at any one time to complete the work. That was one of the routes considered by the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard. So far as the improvement has been conducted, I believe it affords great facilities for transportation in the country through which it passes. It has not been completed to the Mississippi River. There is an appropriation which was not objected to in any way, as I remarked, for the continuation of that improvement. If it shall be determined to make that improvement efficient, it can be done without interfering with this improvement, and there are certainly features in this work which are distinct entirely from that.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator further, if he will pardon me, upon what information the committee acted in making this recommendation?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Iowa has the reports in regard to this matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Was there any report from the engineers of the Army, and, if so, from whom?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Iowa is directly interested in this improvement, as representing the State of Iowa, and I have asked him to refer to the papers that we have had, and present the views of his own people in regard to this matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand that the committee have no report from the Engineer Department?

Mr. ALLISON. So far from that being true, there has been a full survey made by the Engineer Bureau of the War Department under Colonel Macomb, one of the most eminent engineers of the Army, and made under the direction and authority of an act of Congress. In that report he states the total cost of this canal as proposed in the amendment to be $3,900,000. I have not that report at hand, but if the Senator desires to have it read I can send for it; it is in my committee-room.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Engineer Department recommend this scheme as practicable?

Mr. ALLISON. They not only recommend it as practicable, so far as I know, but they recommend it as one of the most important and essential works under the charge of the Engineer Bureau of the War Department. Of course that is not found in the report of last year; but I am speaking of the report of a preceding year.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say one other word about this proposition. I have looked into it in part. I have no doubt the chances are that the canal, if built, would be very important; but in considering the question of the proposed canal from Baltimore to the Delaware Bay, Colonel Craighill made a full report, General Wright was before our committee, and everybody seemed to think that it would be a very great improvement; that it would serve as an interior line of defense in time of war between the Chesapeake and the Delaware, and that it would cheapen freight from a cent and a half to two cents a bushel upon grain; and the men east of the Alleghanies and the people who are raising wheat in Iowa, Kentucky, Wisconsin, and elsewhere have been clamoring for it.

The committee that I have the honor to belong to, having no river and harbor bill to which we could attach that measure, after serious reflection determined that when the Hennepin Canal question was up, whether we reported first from the Transportation Committee in regard to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, or whether the Committee on Commerce reported first with regard to the Hennepin Canal, the advantages, the disadvantages, the rights of the United States, the benefits of the work to the citizens, could all be fairly considered; and it having been considered in committee, which is the place where it ought to be considered, as independent measures of each bearing upon the commerce of the country, the matter could be passed on by the Senate in a proper way.

The obtaining of cheap transportation is beyond all question one of the things we have to look at in the future. The competition of our great water-ways with the railroads is doubtless one way to secure it. A canal leading from Baltimore to the Delaware Bay is beyond question one of the means of securing it. The Hennepin Canal, I hope, is going to have better success than the Fox and Wisconsin improvement. If it is not, I shall regret it very much.

I do not think that grave questions of this sort, whether they pertain to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal or the Hennepin Canal, ought to be made adjuncts to a river and harbor bill and forced through by the pressure of necessity, but ought to stand upon their own merits and be acted on after full discussion. As independent measures let them be passed upon and be carried out, and let us determine what is best.

I will mention one other fact. The Senator from Maryland [Mr.

GORMAN] sent word here this morning by telegraph that he is sick and unable to be in the Senate to-day. He expressed a great anxiety to be here when this amendment was considered. He has been before our committee time and again, and in arguments of great ability has shown the importance of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. He desires to present the claims of that canal in connection with the Hennepin Canal scheme. His colleague, [Mr. GROOME,] and other gentlemen, have pressed that matter before us for months. While I make no point of order upon this amendment, I have felt as though the Senator from Maryland ought to be here and that the two questions ought to be considered together, and the whole subject ought to be detached, if possible, from an ordinary river and harbor bill. If the Hennepin Canal has merits, and I hope there is a great deal of merit in it, let it stand upon its merits. The only objection is that after I have voted time and again money for the Fox and Wisconsin improvement, having been made to believe it was to be a great thing, it seems to me that it is a failure now, so far as I know. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will tell us if it is not. I do not want to go into any other experiment or any other canal project until after full discussion and full information.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I cannot tell the Senator from Kentucky that the Fox and Wisconsin improvement was not a failure.

Mr. BECK. I was afraid of that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The improvement of the Fox River and the canal connecting the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers are nearly completed. There has been little work done as yet on the Wisconsin River, but no one in Wisconsin is of the opinion that the improvement is a failure, neither is the Engineer Bureau of the Army of that opinion. We have just as high hope of it as we had when the Senate first voted money for the improvement.

Mr. BECK. I am very glad to hear it. I shall make no point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. It is proposed to appropriate $100,000 by the amendment, and yet I see that the very first clause of the amendment provides—

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey, lay out, and construct a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River.

If it is true—and I have, of course, no right to doubt its truth—that there has been a survey and a report made by a board of Army engineers, what is the necessity for an additional survey? It seems to me that we are groping rather in the dark. I would prefer to have some more light on this subject before I go blindly in my support of this measure and not know what I am doing.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will send for the report of the Chief of Engineers of 1870, and look at page 57, he will see the survey, and then in the report of 1875—I do not remember the exact page—he will find another report. I will send for those two volumes.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish the Senator would, so that we may get the estimates and know what they are. The Committee on Commerce appear to have no information on the subject.

Mr. CALL. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the committee. At the end of the amendment I move to add:

And $200,000 for a ship-canal across Florida, at such point as the Chief Engineer shall select, to be expended under the direction of the Chief Engineer in commencing the construction of a canal.

Mr. McMILLAN. There has been no estimate or recommendation for that at any time or in any way by any one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota make the point of order?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point of order upon the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. MORGAN. The point of order is that under Rule 29 it is liable to several objections: first, it proposes general legislation on an appropriation bill; second, it is not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator read the rule, if he pleases?

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point of order under Rule 29 and Rule 28 both; it is amenable to both.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator please read the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama make two points of order, and, if so, under what rule does he make them?

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point under Rule 28 and also Rule 29—Rule 29 first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the case of Rule 28 what is the point of order the Senator raises?

Mr. MORGAN. It is that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill. That is the first point. Second, it is new matter not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question of order to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it now debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order as to general legislation is debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to explain the ground of my point of order. The bill is entitled "A bill making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes." The words "and for other purposes" do not mean anything as giving a definition to the character of the bill itself, for if they were to mean anything it would enable us to include anything under the term "for other purposes" that we saw proper to include. It makes no difference whether it was germane to the bill or a subject of general legislation or a subject entirely foreign to the general subject-matter of the bill.

When the bill was brought from the House it was brought as an appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors. It was so referred to the Committee on Commerce and so considered by that committee. No one but the committee ever attempted to introduce into the bill any other subject than that of "the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors," which is the title of the bill.

There is nothing in common between the measure which is sought to be ingratted upon the bill by way of amendment and the bill itself, except that they relate to water intercommunication between different points. Rivers and harbors upon which certain works exist, for the construction, repair, and preservation of which this bill was designed, are not canals which are yet undug. They are not canals which stretch across the country at great elevations, as mentioned by the Senator from Iowa in some remarks that he made in reply to the Senator from South Carolina. In other words, it is utterly absurd to call that a river, or a harbor, or an existing channel of water communication upon which the surveys have not yet been made. A bill to construct such a projected canal as that is not a bill to construct a work upon a river, or a harbor, or any existing line of water communication. I will not detain the Senate by amplifying that idea, because I think there is scarcely a school-boy in this country who cannot understand it.

The Senate Committee on Commerce on the 14th of June reported a bill for the very purpose mentioned in the pending amendment to the river and harbor bill. It is an elaborate project, and one that deserves the serious consideration of the Senate of the United States. It is a project which the Committee on Commerce brought in here, its own report, an apparently unanimous report, to be submitted to the consideration of the Senate without the pressure behind it of an enormous appropriation bill relating to other subjects which are legitimate under the Constitution and the practice of the Government of the United States. That committee, after having reported that bill to the Senate, and having offered to us the opportunity to discuss it upon its merits, as I understand, without its having been referred to that committee as an amendment to the river and harbor bill, again present it in this form.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. MORGAN. Then that is a mistake. However, the committee, if the bill has been referred to it, has seen proper to change the bill in many particulars. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the bill which was heretofore reported on the 14th of June by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] is the same bill which was referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. McMILLAN. Substantially so. I do not remember particularly. I have not compared very lately the bill as reported by the committee with the amendment, but it is substantially the same thing. The amendment was offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] I think it embraced the bill just as it was reported by the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce did not report the original bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa and referred to it but reported an original bill, making some amendments. I do not know what copy of the bill the Senator holds in his hand. We amended the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce, and it was reported back in that way. The Senator from Iowa subsequently offered an amendment to the river and harbor bill which embraced, as I understood, the bill as reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORGAN. I find no amendment in the text of Senate bill No. 2020 which was reported by the Senator from New York, [Mr. MILLER.] It may be an original bill reported by the committee. I do not know about that; but there are no amendments reported to the bill, at least none are italicized and so printed in the bill that I hold in my hand.

Thus the Committee on Commerce did furnish us with a complete bill for the purpose of constructing the Hennepin Canal, and submitted to the Senate the privilege of voting upon that bill and so amending it as to give a better law if one could be enacted by this body.

Then it appears that the Senator from Iowa upon his own motion caused a bill similar in substance to the one reported to be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that bill, with some probable modifications, (I do not know how that is,) has been reported back to the Senate as an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

The point of order that I make is certainly a valuable protection to the rights of Senators on this floor, if the point is well taken at all; and it seems to me if it be not well taken there is nothing that relates to the subject of transportation from point to point which might not be included in a river and harbor bill.

It is said that the amendment is germane to the general subject-matter of the bill because it relates to commerce. That is a begging of the question. A railway bill is just as germane, because that relates to commerce; a bill to erect a telegraph line is just as germane, because it relates to commerce. If it is the increase of the facilitation of commerce that this bill, by the liberal construction sought to be imposed upon it, is to include, then there is no vehicle of commerce, whether railway or what not, that may not be included in a river and harbor bill.

Those who framed this rule never gave to it that interpretation. On the contrary, the rule was established for the purpose of excluding that interpretation. If the rule means anything at all, it is that whatever appropriations shall come in upon a general appropriation bill shall be germane to the subject of that bill. The subject of this bill is not commerce or commercial facilities, but it is transportation by water routes, and not only transportation by water routes, but it is transportation by such routes as exist, and I believe, and have always believed, such routes as would be fairly construed to be navigable within the meaning of the laws of the United States upon that subject at the time when the bill itself might be introduced or passed upon by the Senate.

Therefore this amendment is not germane. More than that, we are informed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] has prepared an elaborate paper as an amendment in some form for the purpose of having it ingrafted on Senate bill No. 2020, which was reported by the Senator from New York. I should like to know why that amendment of the Senator from Maryland is not in order if this is in order? Is it because the Committee on Commerce have not considered it?

Mr. McMILLAN. It has never been referred at all to the Committee on Commerce. I do not know what other committee may have had charge of it.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Committee on Commerce is estopped from raising that question here. If Senate bill No. 2020 was referred to the Committee on Commerce and they reported it back as a separate measure, they themselves have disrobed themselves of authority over this very subject by reporting a measure to the Senate in the form of Senate bill No. 2020, which covers the whole ground. After they made such a report as that it would not have been according to rule, it would not have been according to the order of the Senate as heretofore observed, to have referred that same bill back to that committee, unless upon a motion to recommit, and there was no motion to commit.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me to state the facts, I think he will see that he is entirely incorrect. As I said when I occupied the floor before, a separate bill for this improvement was introduced by the Senator from Iowa and referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce considered that separate bill, and reported it back to the Senate favorably, with amendments. That bill is on the Calendar. Subsequently to that report the Senator from Iowa submitted an amendment to the river and harbor bill, and had it referred to the Committee on Commerce, embracing the substance of the separate bill. The Committee on Commerce were called upon to consider that amendment to the river and harbor bill. They did consider it, and they have reported it as a part of the river and harbor bill now before the Senate. It is not offered on the floor of the Senate as an amendment to this bill; it is an amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce; and it seems to me that the point of order made by the Senator from Alabama that this is an amendment to the bill is not well taken, for it is the bill itself as reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me ask the Senator from Minnesota, are we not now dealing with the amendments of the committee?

Mr. McMILLAN. We are dealing with the bill as it is reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Are we not now passing upon the amendments proposed by the committee to the bill as it came from the House?

Mr. McMILLAN. They are a part of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then they are amendments to the bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. They are a part of the bill. The bill came to us from the House, and we have reported a bill which is amended. Of course the Senate must act upon those amendments, but there is no amendment here offered in the Senate to the bill reported by the committee. This is a part of the bill itself.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I have not yielded the floor. I was interrupted by the Senator from Minnesota without having yielded the floor. I have not yet stated my point.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator decline to be interrupted further?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not. I thought the Senator from Iowa was taking the floor in his own right. If the Senator has any question he desires to ask me, of course I will hear him.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I thought the Senator was through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from Alabama that on the question of relevancy debate is out of order unless by unanimous consent. On the point of order as to general legislation, debate is permitted. The rule is explicit, the Senator will see. If there is no objection, the Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. It is almost impossible to determine whether this is general legislation without determining its relevancy to the bill in hand. We are in this attitude upon the question as to whether it is general legislation: the Committee on Commerce did report Senate bill No. 2020, which I have in my hand. That same bill, it appears, was submitted by the Senator from Iowa and referred to the Committee on Commerce as an amendment to the river and harbor bill. We have it, then, in two forms here. It is upon our Calendar for consideration as a measure of general legislation, and it is also upon the river and harbor bill as an amendment to that bill. Is it general legislation, or is it special legislation, relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors? Which is it? The committee have taken both horns of the dilemma; they have reported it in both forms. They now seek to withdraw from one form, leaving the bill on the Calendar as one they should never have reported, for if it was a mere amendment to the river and harbor bill; if that was the effect of it from the beginning; if that is the effect of it in substance and in its essence, then it should never have been reported otherwise than as an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

After the committee have reported it as a separate, independent, substantive measure, taking the measure upon its face, they now report it as an amendment to the river and harbor bill, as a provision entirely new, not found in any river and harbor bill ever enacted by any Congress, relating to a new topic, making broad and careful provision for the erection and carrying into effect of a great public work that we are told is to cost not less than nine or ten million dollars. The committee seek now to put that upon an appropriation bill, and to require us either to vote for that measure, or to vote against all other important measures here for the preservation of public works upon the great rivers and harbors of this country.

Sir, I can characterize that as being nothing less than an abuse of the rule, an abuse of the law, and it is something that the Senate ought not to allow. There are Senators here who desire to vote for this river and harbor bill when it shall contain those provisions for which the people of the United States at large ought to be taxed, but there are some who are not willing to vote for measures of this kind when the taxing power of this country is resorted to in order to raise money to build works of internal improvement in which the nation itself has no general interest and where nature has made no line of demarcation upon the bosom of the earth to indicate and intend that a drop of water should ever flow through it or about it except upon the surface of the earth from the natural rainfall.

I object to having these measures carried through in this way. Often and often have I sat in the Senate and listened (and I have always sympathized with that view of the case) to objections being made where it was sought to fasten upon general appropriation bills measures that were not germane, not relevant, and that were new and general in their ordinary acceptation and beyond dispute.

I have ventured to make this point of order because I thought that it was my duty as a Senator to attempt to protect my rights and the rights of other Senators on an appropriation bill for works of internal improvement, an appropriation bill for the construction, preservation, and repair of works upon rivers and harbors, so that I could vote fairly for such measures as this without being compelled to take up some other measure which, standing by itself or in connection with some amendment that might be proposed to it, I might not find it to be my conscientious and constitutional duty to vote for.

I believe in limiting the power to raise money by taxation in the United States to the legitimate purposes of Government. I believe the most dangerous abuse that this country can be exposed to is the abuse of the power of taxation. The great tyrant of every free government is the power of taxation. It is true that where people have no power of resistance to it liberty itself is destroyed. It is like a law of impressment; like a law of forced enlistment; like a law of conscription; like a law for carrying on the military operation of a government in time of war. It is an irresistible decree of the supreme legislative power; and when you say that you do anything in virtue of the taxing power of the Government of the United States, every man who undertakes to resist that must be at a great disadvantage. Even the judges upon the bench find the greatest possible difficulty in restraining or limiting the power of taxation.

Here we are taxing now $10,000,000 out of the people of the United States to build a canal through the bosom of a great State of this country, and a State that is just as able to build the canal to-day, and far more so, than New York was when it built the great line of which De Witt Clinton was the founder. We propose now to tax the people it is said not less than $10,000,000 in the outcome, to use the taxing-power of this country to do this, and in order to reach the subject you attach it to a bill of internal improvements where there can scarcely be liberty of speech or action upon it.

If this measure is adopted under this restraint, under this force, under this compulsion, it will be a measure of which it will be hereafter said it could not pass on its merits, subject to debate or amendment, when it came into the Senate of the United States, and its friends had to tack it on an appropriation bill in order to get it through.

Sir, if you indulge this license in this case look out for the future, for the time will not be far distant when every section of this country that can muster power enough to get a few recruits by combinations and log-rolling with other sections of the country will build canals at the expense of the people of the United States at large. Then the taxing power of this country will be abused to its last degree.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I find in looking at the title of the bill as it came to the Senate from the House, because the title is not proposed to be amended in the Senate, it is "a bill making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes." If we are to judge of the amendments that are in order from the title to the bill, if this amendment was offered by any Senator it would be in order. But as I look over the bill I see it bristling with just such appropriations as we propose with reference to this canal. There are in the bill separate and distinct appropriations for two other canals.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama now to a question with regard to these canals. I call his attention to the fact that there is an appropriation in this bill of $250,000 to improve the Muscle Shoals in the State of Tennessee, and what is that improvement but the building of a canal thirty-one miles in length, the estimated cost of which is over $3,000,000, and for which we have appropriated already nearly $1,000,000 in river and harbor bills?

Mr. HARRIS. Under existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. Under existing law. What law? The law of appropriation bills in regard to rivers and harbors, and no other.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that nature had built the Tennessee River and the banks thereof, and the effort of Congress is merely to connect them by removing obstructions.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly, and nature has provided the great Mississippi River and the chain of Northern lakes and the Illinois River, and has put a little neck of land of sixty-five miles instead of thirty-one between them, and we only propose to connect those two great systems of water communication.

I call attention to another feature of this bill, and not of this bill only, but of another bill. What is the power and authority under which these improvements are made from year to year? It is the power and the authority of authoritative surveys made by engineers according to law, and appropriations made in pursuance of such surveys. In 1870—there is the statute—the Hennepin Canal was authorized to be surveyed. It was surveyed, and the estimated cost of its construction according to that survey is $3,900,000, and not $10,000,000, as stated by the Senator from Alabama.

Again, in 1873 Congress thought it of so much importance to improve the water-ways of our country that a special committee of the Senate was raised for that purpose, composed of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] as its chairman, my honored friend from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] and my honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr BECK] I believe was also a member of that committee, besides several other leading Senators of that time. The committee made a most elaborate and useful report, covering the great question of transportation, than which there is no more important question for us to consider either now or at the time it was considered by that committee. In that report they reported favorably to certain water-routes from the Atlantic to the seaboard and favorable to the great Mississippi River. Upon the heels of their report we appropriated five and a half million dollars for the single purpose of building jetties at the mouth of that river and opening it up to navigation. They reported other measures, and among others this Hennepin Canal, and it is second to none in their report. They demonstrated with the absolute truth of mathematics that on every bushel of wheat that should be carried through that canal or transported through the Mississippi River to the lakes there would be a saving to the farmers and producers of from five to ten cents per bushel. Of the 275,000,000 bushels of corn produced in my own State, according to the report of the Senator from Minnesota, as chairman of that committee, there would be a saving, if that was transported to Chicago, of from five to ten cents per bushel, or of, say, $27,000,000 per annum to the people of the State of Iowa.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to state my point of order further, so that he may argue upon it?

Mr. ALLISON. I am on the point of order, and the Senator from Alabama was on the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to state my point of order so that he may argue on it if he chooses. I also raise the point of order under Rule 27. The following is the text of the rule:

> 27. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate; or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

I make the point in that connection that this increases the appropriation; it is a new item of appropriation to the bill as it came from the House, and the Committee on Commerce is not the committee that can move an appropriation of that character; it must be done by some other committee than the one which considers the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire a ruling on that point?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not. I stated the proposition so that the Senator from Iowa might argue upon it if he chose. It is for the Chair to say whether he prefers to rule upon it now or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order made by the Senator from Alabama is confined to the recommendation of a standing or select committee, as the Chair understands the point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. I say this amendment adds a new item of appropriation; that it is an increase of appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule forbids a new item of appropriation "unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate."

Mr. MORGAN. Upon that branch I raise the point of order. I say the standing Committee of the Senate on Commerce has no right, on its own motion, to move an amendment of this character to the bill; that it must be done on the suggestion of some other committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule does not state which standing committee; it simply says a standing committee of the Senate. The Committee on Commerce is a standing committee of the Senate, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I was stating that this proposition was recommended by a committee selected by the Senate to investigate this special subject. It will be found most elaborately recommended in their report and the reasons are there given for it. In pursuance of their recommendation, in the river and harbor bill of 1874—I am endeavoring to state this matter somewhat historically—there was a statute passed directing the Engineer Bureau of the War Department to make a survey of the four water-routes recommended by the special committee and to make estimates of the cost, which survey was made so far as the connection between Chicago and the Mississippi River is concerned, in pursuance of the law of 1874. In 1870 the statutes of the country had directed the Engineer Bureau of the War Department to make the surveys and estimates of cost.

In 1875 this very identical bill, almost in the language employed here, was introduced as an amendment to a river and harbor bill and passed the Senate by a vote of 29 to 16. I believe it was finally struck out in committee of conference. So that this question is just as much before the Senate and just as much in order with reference to rivers and harbors as any question that is presented in the bill.

Why is it that we have an appropriation here of $5,000,000 attached to this bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River? I live on the banks of that river and I am in favor of making that improvement and shall vote for it; but I say here in the presence of my own people that I regard this appropriation for the Hennepin Canal as more important than the appropriation for the Mississippi River. If this is not in order, the appropriation for the Mississippi River itself is not in order, because we passed in this body a separate bill for that same purpose, and according to the logic of the Senator from Alabama because we have considered a bill separate and apart from the river and harbor bill, therefore we cannot take it up again and consider it in another form in connection with that!

Take the provision in this very bill looking to the establishment of reservoirs at the headwaters of the Mississippi River. The very same provisions are in the bill as it came from the House appertaining to the condemnation of land, &c., as are found in the amendment with reference to the Hennepin Canal. So of other matters.

With regard to the imposition of great expenditures by means of these appropriations, my friend from South Carolina was a good deal in earnest about ascertaining what the cost of this work would be. Does not my friend know that the cost is just as accurately ascertained, nay more so, than is the cost of the improvement of Charleston Harbor?

Mr. BUTLER. I was not making the inquiry with a view of drawing any contrast between Charleston Harbor and any other place. If the Senator will pardon me, I only wanted to get information about it. As I said a while ago, I do not know that I am opposed to the measure if I can get the proper kind of information. The Senator stated on a previous occasion that we made an appropriation for the building of the jetties of the Mississippi River, but the Senator must consider that that was done after the most elaborate discussion. It was done on the recommendation of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. ALLISON. It was done on a river and harbor bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Captain Eads undertook to make those jetties at his own risk, and was not to get one dollar until he accomplished certain results. I ask the Senator if anybody will attempt to build the Hennepin Canal on those conditions? My objection to the whole business as it now stands is that it appears to have been considered very crudely by the committee. The Committee on Commerce confessedly admit that they know nothing about it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. We have made no such admission, if the Senator from South Carolina pleases. I referred the Senator from South Carolina to the Senator from Iowa as having possession of the documents, to whom he could refer, and who would give him more accurate information.

Mr. BUTLER. I applied to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I took charge of the reports.

Mr. BUTLER. I have been informed that there was no evidence before the committee except the statement made by the Senator from Iowa and perhaps the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. ALLISON. The presumption is that Senators have ordinary knowledge of the affairs of our Government with reference to these matters as with reference to others.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not exactly safe to act on presumption always in matters of legislation of so much consequence as this. I should be very glad if the Senator from Iowa would inform the Senate precisely what the estimates are for this work.

Mr. ALLISON. I will do so.

Mr. BUTLER. If I can get that information the chances are that I shall vote for this proposition; but it seems to me it has been very crudely presented to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. The estimate of cost for the work, as made by the engineer who made the survey, is $3,800,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Can the Senator refer me to that report? I should like to see it for my own information.

Mr. ALLISON. It is found in the two pages marked here, which I hand the Senator. That is the estimate of the engineer who made this survey under the direction of Colonel Macomb, one of the most eminent engineers in the Engineer Corps of our Army, who was then stationed at Rock Island, Illinois. But of course I do not say that that will be the exact cost of this canal. I think very likely it could be built for much less now. I wish to call the attention of Senators to the unreliability of such estimates. They are not made or pretended to be made with absolute accuracy. They may fall $100,000 or $200,000 short of the actual cost. Take the harbor of Charleston. That has how many hundred thousand dollars in this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. The harbor of Charleston has $300,000 in this bill. Can anybody tell me what it will cost to improve that harbor upon the scale in which the money is being expended?

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the Senator that there was not one dollar appropriated to Charleston Harbor until General Gillmore, the engineer in charge, had given the most accurate estimate.

Mr. ALLISON. So I know.

Mr. BUTLER. And upon that Congress made the appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. So I know.

Mr. BUTLER. I would be perfectly willing to vote this money for the Hennepin Canal if we had some such evidence before us.

Mr. ALLISON. The estimate of General Gillmore was $1,800,000. Another estimate has been made of $2,750,000 upon the scale of the jetty system at the harbor of Charleston. I am for that improvement; I intend to vote for that improvement, because I believe in improving the rivers and harbors of our country, although I submit to the Senator from South Carolina, who criticises this amendment, that all the commerce which comes into or goes out of the harbor of Charleston is not one-thousandth part of the commerce that will go over this canal when it is constructed. There is no sort of comparison which can be made between that work, costing $2,750,000, and this work, which will cost $3,900,000.

The progress of this country in the Northwest is without parallel in the history of any nation. Take Chicago, the great central, pivotal point, being at the head of this great system of the Northwestern lakes, having nine railroads terminating there from the East and seven diverging there from the West, with a population in 1870 of only 280,000 people, with a devastating and desolating fire in 1871 destroying in a single night more than $300,000,000 of property, recuperating and recovering so that in 1880 it had a population of 503,000 people. It is for the purpose of distributing by cheap waterways the great commerce that concentrates at Chicago and Saint Louis and diverges from those points to the nine or ten or eleven million people who dwell in that region of the Northwest that this improvement is urged, and it does not relate to any single class of commercial transactions. It does not relate alone to the products of wheat and corn and the heavier and bulkier products of the farm; it relates to what we consume as well. Every single pound of salt that goes to those 11,000,000 people in that region must go either from the State of Michigan or from the State of New York; it must be transported by rail from Chicago or Milwaukee unless we can have a cheap water-way.

Mr. HOAR. What will be the capacity of the vessels?

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred and eighty tons burden, eighty tons burden more than those on the Erie Canal, which in 1880 transported six million tons of the heavier freight of our country from Buffalo to tide-water.

That is the character of the improvement that we propose to make here with $3,900,000, affecting as it does the commerce of this whole country, affecting as it does the price of railway transportation. We have a railway property in the Northwest aggregating in capital $400,000,000, and covering lines of railway extending for thousands of miles, diverging to the South and Southwest and to the North and Northwest and West. And we are to be met here by a point of order from the Senator from Alabama on the ground that this is a mere local improvement pertaining to the State of Illinois alone. It has nothing to do materially with the State of Illinois as compared with the vast region of country to be benefited, both East and West. Not only that, but take the bulkier product of coal. Travel through the State of Iowa, in which I live, during the inclement season of the year, and you will find that in every town we are burning the anthracite coal that comes from the coal-fields of Pennsylvania. We burn that coal coming to us by rail from the city of Chicago at an enormous price per ton, coming as it does to Chicago by waterway nearly the whole distance; and the cost of transportation by rail is greater from Chicago to the city in which I live than it is from the mines where it is mined to the city of Chicago.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Iowa will indulge me in a question, I want to ask him if the Senate has not as much right to put an amendment on this bill to build a railway across the State of Illinois as it has to put an amendment upon it to build a canal across the State of Illinois?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate has the right to build water-ways by this bill. That is what it is doing; it is not building railways. It has a right to improve the water-ways by such methods as it thinks wise and judicious, whether it be by the building of a canal a mile long or sixty miles long. Does not the Senator from Alabama know that the Sault Sainte Marie Canal which connects the lake system with the Northwest was built by the Government of the United States, and paid for, and is a free canal, and that to-day all commerce that goes by lake passes through that Sault Sainte Marie Canal, and that it was all done upon river and harbor bills?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to submit to my friend a proposition. As the Senator from Iowa knows, the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN,] who is now sick and at his home, telegraphed me this morning asking me if possible to have this proposition delayed until to-morrow. I ask my friend from Iowa and the friends of the amendment whether they will not let this amendment be passed over without the point of order being decided, and take it up to-morrow, when the Senator from Maryland will be here. I think that would answer the whole purpose. Otherwise, I say to my friend from Iowa I shall feel it to be my duty, under a telegram from the Senator from Maryland, to offer as an amendment to the amendment the bill introduced by the Senator from Maryland, providing for the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. I hope and believe the Senator from Maryland will be here to-morrow. Neither Senator from Maryland is now in his seat, and I think it would do no harm to let this matter go over until the morning. The rest of the bill can be proceeded with.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that such an amendment would not be in order until the amendments of the committee are disposed of, and when the Senator from Maryland returns he can then offer his amendment to the bill and the Senate can pass upon it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is an entirely distinct measure.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The chairman is mistaken. If offered at all it must be offered as an amendment to the pending amendment. The chairman is mistaken about that, but I do not want to get into a wrangle on the subject. I hope it will be agreeable to delay the amendment until to-morrow. It will do no harm to anything to pass it over until the morning, when the Maryland Senators will be in. The Senator from Iowa knows what their feeling is toward the whole question.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate at length, and I should not have done so but for the fact that the Senator from Alabama does not seem to have studied geography with reference to this question. He does not seem to know that a canal sixty-five miles in length will connect the great water-ways of this country, and make a water-line from Saint Paul to the Atlantic Ocean; or if he does, he has failed to call the slightest attention to it in his criticisms upon the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator does me great injustice. I know that a water-line sufficiently long, say 5,000 miles, would connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Mr. ALLISON. I have looked over this bill, I have studied it somewhat, and I want to say that if we cannot have the amendments made to the bill which are necessary to carry on the commerce of the country the bill and all there is in it might just as well go. I have looked over the bill. Take the Little Kanawha River, in the State of West Virginia, as an illustration. What is that? There is an appropriation for that improvement in this bill. It is to extend the navigation of the little Kanawha twelve miles beyond the point where a navigation company has improved it. Take the New River in Wythe County, Virginia.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will do me the justice to say that I always vote against those measures.

Mr. ALLISON. I am only speaking of the singularity of the Senator from Alabama in waiting until forty-three pages of the bill had been gone over bristling with items that are not in order, according to his theory, and waking up in a moment to attack a great commercial canal that is intended to affect the price of all the products that are transported from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Ocean. That is what I complain of, and I have a right to complain of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. One of the objections is the question of power in Congress to make this canal, and the Senator from Alabama propounded the question to the Senator from Iowa whether Congress would not have the same right to build a railroad over the same point of ground. I should like to hear the Senator on the power of Congress to build such a canal as is proposed.

Mr. HOAR. What is the question before the Senate? What is the point of order before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has raised a double point of order, that the amendment is general legislation, and that it is irrelevant to the subject-matter of the pending bill.

Mr. HOAR. Is not that required by the rules to be submitted without debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated at the outset that as the Senator had coupled the relevancy of the amendment with the point as to general legislation, the Chair was compelled to submit it as one question to the Senate. As the question of relevancy is not debatable, the Chair asked if there was unanimous consent to debate it, and unanimous consent was given. If the Senator from Massachusetts objects the Chair will arrest debate.

Mr. HARRIS. Has unanimous consent been given to debate the merits of the proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent was given to debate the question of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope the Senator from Iowa will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HOAR. The question has run beyond, far into the merits, but very little has been said about the question of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not trespass further on the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has been generous in permitting debate, because the Senator from Alabama was allowed to proceed on the merits.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will certainly be no objection to the Senator from Iowa proceeding.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not intend to cut off the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I had about finished what I was saying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. What I cannot understand is the Senator from Alabama sticking in the bark about this amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me I shall be glad to hear him through, but I desire to give notice that I shall object to any debate on the merits of the proposition after the Senator from Iowa has concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not occupy more than a minute more, because I do not wish to trespass on the rules of the Senate. I only want to call the attention of the Senators to the fact that the bill is full of little items which do not affect the general commerce of the country, and I have instanced the one from West Virginia. I have voted for that project hitherto, and I expect to vote for it again, but I do not understand how Senators can object to the provisions of this amendment and then stand by and see all those provisions pass without objection.

Take the one little river in Virginia which we have appropriated for now for four or five years. The engineers report that there is only one foot of water in it, and that the object of the improvement is to secure two feet of water navigation in that river. So I might go through State by State and show that there are local improvements and local measures in it which do not affect the great body of the people of this country, as this great measure of the Mississippi River affects the people, and as this Hennepin Canal does, from the fact that it connects the water-ways of the great East with the water-ways of the West and forms competing routes both North and South for all the products of the people who live in the Northwestern States.

That is all I desire to say. I do not want this amendment ruled out in a perfunctory manner, without understanding and investigating the merits of the whole case. I want Senators to understand what there is in this proposition.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator, before he takes his seat, point me to a single case in the bill where an artificial mode of transportation or connection, a canal, a railroad, or a turnpike, is provided for inside the limits of a State? That is the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to get into a controversy with my friend on these questions, but I call his attention to the canal around the Dalles in the Columbia River; I call his attention to the canal in Tennessee, to the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, and to a great many other smaller or greater appropriations which are in this bill. I cannot detail them now.

Mr. VEST. But the Senator will find no appropriation for any such canal, unless it is to obviate obstructions in a navigable stream. That is the point I make.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly; and that is exactly what this is.

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. It is to remove the obstructions that lie between the Mississippi River and the great chain of Northwestern lakes, for the benefit of the agricultural interests of this country.

Mr. VEST. The Senator will excuse me; there is no pretense nor can there be a shadow of a pretense that there is any navigable stream near this proposed canal.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will remind the Senator from Missouri that in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers there is a canal there which connects two distinct streams on the same principle that is proposed in this case.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from Minnesota——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind Senators as they are warming up that they must address the Chair, or the Chair will not recognize them.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, will the chairman of the Committee on Commerce or any other Senator who advocates this project, as the question of geographical knowledge has been invoked on this floor, point me to a navigable stream along the route of this canal for sixty-five miles the obstructions to which are obviated by the construction of this work?

Mr. CONGER. I want to remark on that proposition when the Senator has finished.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator from Tennessee gave notice that he would arrest debate after the Senator from Iowa concluded. If he does not do so, I shall.

Mr. HARRIS. As my friend from Missouri is on the floor, I desire to say that I shall raise the question of order upon him or any other Senator who proposes to debate the merits of the amendment. The debate must be confined to the question of order. That is the pending question.

Mr. CONGER. Upon that I wish to make a few remarks whenever the Senator from Missouri has done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course I will yield for any question to the Senator from Michigan. I have asked a question, and if the Senator from Michigan can answer it I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. CONGER. As to the relevancy of this amendment? I suppose the relevancy of this amendment to the subject-matter of the bill is the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And that it is general legislation. There are two points of order in one.

Mr. CONGER. The whole bill is general legislation affecting commerce and transportation, and nothing else.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point of order that the matter must be submitted without debate.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know what particular object the Senator has in raising the point of order on me, but the time may come when I may return the courtesy, which I shall do with pleasure.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I call the Senator from Missouri to order.

Mr. HOAR. I made the suggestion. I did not have the slightest idea of applying it to the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Tennessee insists that on the point of order raised by the Senator from Alabama debate is out of order. The Chair must decide. There has been a point of order made by the Senator from Alabama. What is it?

Mr. CONGER. I just say that the time may come when the hitch may not be all on one side, and when the point of order may be raised when another Senator desires to speak.

Mr. HARRIS. I call the Senator to order. The Senator from Alabama was fully heard and the Senator from Iowa has been fully heard. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule as to all Senators.

Mr. WINDOM. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the pending point of order. The Senator from Alabama has made two points of order—one that the amendment is general legislation, and the other that it is irrelevant to the subject-matter of the bill. He has referred to both Rule 28 and Rule 29. As to Rule 28 the point of order has no application, but the points of order are covered by Rule 29, as Senators will see by looking at the rule. The Chair will now have the rule read and submit the question to the Senate whether the amendment is general legislation or is relevant to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask a question with reference to the point of order. As I understand it two points have been made: one that the amendment is not relevant, the other that it is general legislation. The point of order as to relevancy is not debatable. The point of order as to general legislation is debatable. Can a Senator prevent debate upon a point of order which is debatable by coupling it with another point of order which is not debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, when a point of order is made on a non-debatable question and the rule is mandatory, is required to submit it to the Senate. No Senator called for a division of the question.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota calls for a division of the question. Then the Chair will submit the two points separately.

Mr. CONGER. The rule says:

> And all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate.

The Chair had already stated that the question of general legislation comes in, which may be debated under this rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will observe that the Chair stated that the Senator from Alabama made two points in one. It was not for the Chair to separate them; but the Chair suggested to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] that no Senator had called for a division of the question, which was divisible. A division has now been called for and the Chair will put the two questions separately, first the one of general legislation, which comes first and which is debatable.

Mr. CONGER. On that I desire to be heard. Mr. President, a decision that such a proposition as this is general legislation would rule out of this bill the improvement of Charleston Harbor directly and absolutely. It is a canal formed by embankments for miles through a sand bank in the ocean; just as much a canal as if made on dry land above water.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. CONGER. I will finish my remarks first.

Mr. BUTLER. Why does the Senator select Charleston Harbor for his remarks?

Mr. CONGER. That improvement is by the extension of dikes and dredging, making a canal for miles from the inner harbor out into the ocean through sand banks, some of them above water and some beneath water. It is a canal.

In this bill are many propositions to straighten rivers by cutting a canal through dry land. In this bill there are many propositions to turn the water from one river toward its mouth into another channel by a canal advocated here by gentlemen, and I can name them—a canal which is not the water-course of the river. A question of degree cannot determine this, whether it is a short canal or a long canal. The very opening of the mouth of the Mississippi through the South Pass was taking a place where there was no channel navigable, only six or seven feet of water, and cutting a canal by some means for two miles through the sand banks into the Gulf. That was a canal by jetties.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him——

Mr. CONGER. When I get through the Senator can be heard. He refused to let me be heard at all, and I do not propose to give him my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan declines to be interrupted.

Mr. CONGER. When he gives me the time I will give him a part of it.

Now, sir, as I say, there are propositions in this bill where the improvement proposed consists in opening a channel from one river by a canal into another or into a bayou. Why, sir, we have a proposition in this bill not only to dig a canal, but to make a lock in Louisiana—if Senators will look they will find it—to make and construct a lock through a marsh where there is no navigation at all. This bill bristles all over with propositions to dig artificial channels either through land above water or through land under water which is unnavigable; it is so all over the South, and I tell the gentlemen that if this point of order can be raised upon this proposition it will stop the progress of dozens and dozens of works provided for in the bill at the South in the marshy region, in the bayou region, and all over that country. It does not affect the Hennepin Canal alone, but it stops with a jerk dozens of these improvements at the South.

What is the object of this bill that you call this improvement "general legislation" on it. The whole bill is to improve the means of transportation by water, whether it be by building canals to connect navigable waters in one place with navigable waters in another, or whether it be with dredges to dig a canal where there has been a channel of some kind where water has flowed. Where is the legislation in this amendment? I do not speak to the merits of the work at all, but I do say that almost half of the appropriations in this bill have been made to dig canals through the earth under water or over water for navigation. There is not one of the improvements, from New York Harbor clear around the Gulf to Corpus Christi, but what has for its object the making an artificial canal from the mouths of rivers and bays out into the ocean, that are filled with earth or sand. The object is to provide for transportation that vessels may go and come, that they may carry freight, that they may be useful to the people.

Apply this rule, and who shall say whether the channel through a sand-bank or through other ground is excluded under such a rule as this? Is it relevant? Is it relevant to the object? The object is to make communication along water-courses or between water-courses. Where would the Louisville Canal have been if this rule had been applied, or the Keokuk Canal with its eight or ten or twelve miles of channel dug out upon the river, outside of its banks in many cases, or the Sault Sainte Marie Canal, dug through dry ground from the bed in the lake below to the river above, connecting Lake Superior and Lake Huron? They are all canals. It is a mere question of degree whether they are longer or shorter, and the question of degree cannot control any such case as this.

This work takes the improvements which have already been made from Lake Michigan down to Hennepin, a distance of some seventy miles, and there, instead of following the Illinois River two or three hundred miles to the Mississippi, makes a short cut across the land to the Mississippi of sixty-five miles, shortening navigation the whole distance.

Any one familiar with the appropriations made in the river and harbor bills for the last thirteen years will know that in a great many cases, in a majority of cases for improving harbors and improving streams, the engineers have recommended new cuts out of harbors by a shorter passage to the ocean or to the lake, a canal where there was no stream at all, and Congress has approved it. Why? Because the object was an outlet for the navigation of those waters to the greater waters beyond by the shortest, most expeditious, most convenient, most economical route.

Now the friends of this measure say that by digging a canal of sixty-five miles they can save some five or six hundred miles of navigation through the winding, tortuous channel of the Illinois River and the Mississippi River, and will save greatly the expense of transportation and even the expense of improving the Illinois and the Mississippi Rivers. That has been done in other cases North and South and all over this country. The purpose is to connect navigable waters; it is to dig canals along the channel of rivers where there is no navigable water. Half the appropriations in this bill are with a dredge to dig out the undisturbed earth that has lain for ages in the bottom of some of these streams and make a canal. You may say a river flowed there once. You might as well say the whole earth was deluged with water once, and land and stream were all submerged.

In principle, then, the one proposition is as germane to the subject of improving the navigability of the waters of the United States as another. It is only a question of degree. If this object is not of importance enough, the proposition being to connect two such great water-systems, the whole chain of the upper lakes with the great Father of Waters, the Mississippi, by the most convenient and direct and shortest route, then this ought not (when we come to the question) to be voted for, but as long ago as 1819, and from that time until now, this very project has been urged by almost every successive administration to connect the waters of the Mississippi with the great lakes and bring into communication by shipping the waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries and the waters of the great lakes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the bill just received from the House of Representatives be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

The bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 209) to authorize the President of the United States to call an international conference to fix on and recommend for universal adoption a common prime meridian, to be used in the reckoning of longitude and in the regulation of time throughout the world, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] calls me up with a pretty sharp turn because I propounded certain inquiries for the purpose of getting information myself. I think that if the Senator had given us a little more information and a little less venom, we should have got along a great deal better in this matter.

I have not made any point of order against this amendment; I have manifested no opposition to the amendment. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says I criticised it. Certainly I criticised it. I had a right to criticise it. He appeared to put me in opposition to the amendment when I was simply asking for information, and the Senator from Michigan gets up and talks about the Charleston Harbor and says the works in the South will be stopped. I take it for granted the South can stand it as well as any other part of the country. I had no idea of injecting into this debate anything of that sort, but the Senator gets up and arraigns me and says that the Charleston jetties are just as much a canal as the Hennepin Canal. If the Senator had informed himself about what the cost of the Hennepin Canal would be and had given us some information upon that subject rather more than his vague opinion as to what a canal is, I should have been very much obliged to him. I do not say this in any spirit of disrespect to the Senator; but if he has no more knowledge of what the Hennepin Canal is than that which he has manifested in the remarks he has just made, I think he can scarcely ask any Senator on this floor to vote for it.

The Senator from Iowa says it will cost three million and some odd hundred thousand dollars. I have examined the report of the engineers made in 1870, and I find that one of the estimates is that the canal and feeders will cost over $12,000,000. What are the facts about it? The Senator from Michigan is a member of the Committee on Commerce, and he has not vouchsafed to give us one particle of information on that subject, and no other Senator that I have heard has done so; and yet we are asked to vote blindly for an amendment appropriating $100,000 for something which nobody on this floor seems to know anything about.

Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Iowa that it is very important to open these water-ways, and I have been as liberal as any Senator on this floor on that subject, and propose to be, and when I have the information which will justify my vote I think it quite likely that I shall vote for this measure; but I do not think it entirely fair when I ask for information that I should be arraigned as opposing the river and harbor bill. I have not criticised the amendment in any adverse or hostile spirit.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understood the Senator from South Carolina to object to this item in the bill, that it provided for creating a canal, that it was not the improvement of a stream of water.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not object to it on that ground. I asked the chairman of the committee for information, for I really did not have it; I was not posted and informed as to what the canal was, and simply because I asked him his opinion as to the constitutional power of Congress—I expressed no opinion of my own—I was very glad to hear the Senator commit himself——

Mr. McMILLAN. I refer to the case of the Santee River and the Musquito Creek improvement, which is the construction of a canal, straightening a channel and making a stream of water.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; but that was a navigable creek.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is proposed here to cut a channel from one to the other.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely. I have not said Congress has not the right to do this.

Mr. McMILLAN. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I have simply asked the chairman of the committee to give me information as to what it will cost, but he has not been able to give it.

Mr. McMILLAN. The chairman has referred the Senator from South Carolina to the reports that have been made. I have told the Senator from South Carolina that the books were in the immediate possession of the Senator from Iowa. He has referred the Senator from South Carolina to them; he has given him the specific information conveyed to Congress, to the Secretary of War, to the different Departments of the Government; and if the Senator from South Carolina cannot understand that, I cannot explain it more fully to him.

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot understand that report at all. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce brings a bill into the Senate with an important amendment to it, and when he is asked for information he loses his temper and refers me to another Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. No temper whatever has been lost by me, sir. I have referred to the reports of the engineers just as we have the reports of the engineers for the improvement of Charleston Harbor, for the improvement of the Santee River, for the proposition to cut a canal from Musquito Bay so that an outlet can be given to Winyah Bay. All these matters are contained in the reports of the engineers, and I leave them just where they are left in the reports.

Mr. VEST. The Senator does not mean to say that there is anything about the Hennepin Canal in those estimates?

Mr. BUTLER. Not one word.

Mr. McMILLAN. Not in this volume of reports, but it is in reports of the engineers which the Senator from Missouri has in his possession.

Mr. VEST. I have never had them in my possession. I have heard the Senator from Iowa state in committee and here that the cost of that work would be $3,900,000. There is another estimate here by an engineer, Mr. Low, that makes it $12,000,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. And another $19,000,000.

Mr. VEST. And another $19,000,000. Which is it? It was stated that it would only cost two and a half millions. I want to know which one of the charmers is to make us happy.

Mr. HAWLEY. Are we discussing the point of order, or the merits of the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is discussion of the merits in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have been waiting to say a few words on that subject, but nearly all I intended to say has been said on the point of order. I call for a decision on the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has made the point of order that this is general legislation and not in order. The Chair submits the question to the Senate, is this amendment in order under the exception taken by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. VEST called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. What does the Chair rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is not the question of relevancy but of general legislation. There are two points of order raised by the Senator from Alabama, but they were grouped. They were divisible and have been divided. Now, the question is on the point of order whether this is general legislation that will exclude it as a proper amendment to the bill under Rule 29. Those who so believe will vote "yea;" those who do not so believe will vote "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON. Wait a moment. Those who believe that this is proper legislation vote "nay?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The point of order is that this amendment is not in order, being general legislation. Those who so believe will vote "yea;" those not so believing will vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS. That looks like putting the cart before the horse.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is not the question, Is this relevant?

Mr. HARRIS. The question is, Is the amendment in order under the rule? If so, those who believe it is in order vote "yea," and the contrary opinion "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a question of taste. The Chair will so put it if the Senator from Tennessee desires.

Mr. HARRIS. I think that is the proper way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is this amendment in order? Senators so believing will vote "yea."

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Chair was dividing the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been divided before.

Mr. HOAR. Is the Chair throwing it together now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is separated. Does the Senator desire to divide it still further? If so it is not divisible any further.

Mr. HOAR. On which branch of the question are we voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On general legislation, not on relevancy.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair does not put that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Chair's pardon. I understand the Chair to put the question, Is the amendment in order? If that be true, the Senate having voted that it is in order, it concludes all questions. I have no objection to it; but I want the Senate to understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated distinctly that the points made were divided, and that the point of order now made, which came first, was whether this was general legislation; and if so, that it was excluded by the rule. The Chair now puts the question, under that separation, whether this amendment is in order or is inadmissible as being general legislation.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the division been requested?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] The Chair was appealed to to divide the points.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely right about this. I made the point that this amendment was not in order. I cited a certain rule of the Senate under which I insist it is not in order. The Chair submits that question to the Senate. I think, therefore, the vote is upon the question as to whether the amendment is in order under the rules of the Senate. Those who think it is will vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In answer to the Senator from Alabama, the Chair states that the points were divisible: the call for a division was made by the Senator from Minnesota. The Chair is now putting it according to the demand of the Senator from Minnesota, and the point of order coming first is: Is this general legislation? And, if so, under the rule is it excluded? Those who believe that this amendment is in order under the clause of the rule excluding general legislation will say "yea;" those who believe it is not will say "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.]

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] Not knowing how he would vote if present, I will not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Allison,	Call,	Dawes,	Hale,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate declares the amendment in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I am somewhat in the condition of others here; I am quite willing to vote for a reasonable proposition for a Hennepin Canal upon proper surveys and estimates. I say I am willing, and I suppose I should be, for I presume that those estimates would show that the thing was feasible; but I submit that we have not the proper estimates now. I have been carefully looking over the two reports referred to in the debate, but I cannot find such estimates there.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to these reports. The survey of 1875 was under the general orders of Colonel Macomb, conducted by Mr. F. C. Doran, a civil engineer, to whom was allotted that part of the work. That was the survey of a great canal with locks 375 feet by 75, and I suppose the Senator would not like to be confined to that in his estimate for $3,900,000, because the estimate for that is $19,780,534.84, with an omission, as Macomb says in his letter of transmission, of some necessary items concerning locks in a certain place which would raise it $641,284, giving it in Macomb's letter as $20,421,819. That cannot be the one; but if it were the one, after getting through with five or six pages, he says:

With a small party I repaired to the field, but the inclement weather interfered very seriously with the work. The bad state of the weather continuing and the close of the season being at hand, it was determined to postpone this part of the work until the opening of another season.

During a hurried examination of the country I found another reason for deferring the work in the fact that this survey should, to accomplish the best result and to furnish the information desired, embrace a resurvey of the entire western division of this route.

The notes collected are too meager to base an estimate upon, and I refrain from expressing an opinion as to the probable relative advantages of certain proposed terminal points.

That, then, disposes entirely of the 1875 report as any basis of judgment or legislation; but now I go to the only other one that has been referred to.

Mr. FARLEY. When was that report made?

Mr. HAWLEY. In 1875. It is in part second of the Engineer's report for 1875–'76.

Mr. ALLISON. That report was made wholly with reference to that portion of the canal lying between Hennepin and the city of Chicago, and the engineer who makes the report expressly refers to the former survey made by another engineer, so that he did not undertake and he was not instructed to undertake a survey of that portion of the line from Hennepin to the Mississippi River, and of course he did not make it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am in search of information. Macomb says to General Humphreys that he presents the report of Mr. F. C. Doran, assistant engineer, who was charged "with the duty of making the surveys and estimates for the Hennepin Canal route, and particularly for the extension to Chicago."

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. Do we not undertake that extension at all in this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Not now.

Mr. HAWLEY. It has nothing to do with it?

Mr. ALLISON. Nothing whatever.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then the Senator was mistaken originally in referring to the report of 1875 as having anything to do with it, and I lay that aside. The report of 1870 is by Colonel Macomb, transmitting the report of Mr. Gorham P. Low, jr., civil engineer and assistant, a very brief report.

If that report covers the Hennepin Canal it covers a very different canal from the one we have under consideration:

I have, therefore, estimated for a ship-canal section 160 feet in width at the water-line, and 7 feet deep, with slopes of 2 to 1; and for locks 350 feet long and 75 feet wide.

That is 200 feet longer in the locks and 15 feet wider; I will not attempt to go into the other details which are here set forth at some length; but toward the close about half a page is all that refers to the canal named in this amendment. It is all that is to be found mentioned in his report anywhere referring to this proposition—less than half a page as an appendix.

That part of the report giving estimates for a commercial canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River—

That is what we are considering here, I suppose—will be of interest to the canal commissioners of the State of Illinois, and to that part of the community whose interests would be promoted by such a line of communication; and as the ship-canal survey—

Which is evidently the general work—

afforded the data for such an estimate, I authorized it to be appended to the report upon the ship-canal survey.

After going through with this ship-canal survey, which Doran estimates at a cost of $12,479,693.37—twelve and a half millions in round numbers—and completing his remarks on that, he says:

The facts in relation to the large canal having been brought to your notice, you verbally directed me to report and estimate upon a canal of smaller section. I have, therefore, proposed a canal section 60 feet wide at the water-line and 6 feet deep, and having slopes of 2 to 1, with locks 150 feet in length and 21 feet in width.

I recall these two figures as in this amendment; I do not remember any other dimensions now.

These dimensions correspond to those adopted by J. O. Hudnutt, civil engineer, in his estimates for a canal over nearly the same route, based upon surveys made in the summer of 1866.

And he goes on to give various estimates that I need not trouble the Senate with, concerning the locks and swing-bridges, &c., very brief, and in very general terms, the amount of water required for the canal, for evaporation, for lockage, and the demand from Rock River, at Dixon, for a feeder, &c., and then he gives his estimates by sections.

The locks proposed for this work will admit boats of a capacity of two hundred and eighty tons.

That is the figure given in the amendment; so I suppose this is the estimate on which it is based:

At three locksful to a boat, 18,760 tons could be passed daily.

Freight could be brought in tows from points on the Upper Mississippi to the canal, and then by horse-power through this canal to the Illinois River, and through the Illinois and Michigan Canal to Chicago without breaking bulk. I have not considered it any part of my duties to report upon the commercial advantages of this project, nor have I at hand sufficient data for the purpose. I have endeavored to make the estimate sufficiently high, and am of the opinion that the amount stated above would fully cover the cost of construction. The amount of earth-work would probably be somewhat reduced upon a final location.

And here comes the innocence of this civil engineer:

No estimate has been made for land damages, but it is presumed that the counties and cities immediately benefited by the work would relieve the Government from any expenditure under that head.

Colonel Macomb says:

I cannot say that I agree with Mr. Low in the conclusion that, in case of the construction of the canal, "the counties and cities immediately benefited by the work would relieve the Government from any expenditure for damages," but the great cost of the ship-canal will probably prevent the Government from immediately undertaking the work, especially in view of the good water communication between the lakes and the Mississippi by the Illinois River improvement now in progress.

Then he refers to the minor or commercial canals as being of interest to the canal commissioners of Illinois. Now we are asked to undertake a work costing at the lowest possible estimate very near $4,000,000, when there is not put into that estimate the cost of land damages anywhere, the purchase of houses and farms, and the damage to houses and farms by the inevitable leakage that every one knows accompanies a canal. Nor is there put in it the damages that would be claimed by the people enjoying the benefits of Rock River by reason of the very great reduction in the volume and force of that river by taking out so much of it for a feeder.

Mr. BUTLER. Nor of maintenance.

Mr. HAWLEY. Of course nothing is said about maintenance, and that should be capitalized also. I am sure I am utterly unable to make any estimate of that. I should like to know some of these things before I vote; to know whether it will cost $50,000 or $200,000 a year, or what it will cost to keep the canal in order and run it, because that annual cost is to be capitalized and added to the original cost in all fairness.

These are reasons why I find it exceedingly difficult to vote for this amendment without some estimate. There is none but an incidental appendix of less than half a page referring to the canal in general terms.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before the Senator sits down——

Mr. HAWLEY. There is nothing that I have found. I am seeking for information. I may be wrong.

Mr. McMILLAN. The reports of the engineers are all accompanied with appendices in every volume, and they are not more than half a page any of them. You can find important improvements here, two or three on a page, in all the reports.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the main report here occupies three or four pages.

Mr. McMILLAN. Here are two volumes of appendices to the report of the Chief of Engineers, constituting the reports of the local engineers.

Mr. HAWLEY. There are maps and profiles, of course, besides these.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say a word or two in reference to these reports, and I am very sorry they do not satisfy my friend from Connecticut. Of course it is impossible for any report to contain the details of mathematical demonstration as to the cost of any of these improvements. Take, for instance, the harbor at Cleveland, Ohio; I will illustrate by that. Two or three years ago the local engineer estimated that it was a wise thing to enter upon a new improvement there, and that improvement was entered upon by an appropriation in a river and harbor bill, the cost of which when completed will be $1,200,000. Of course if a detailed report had been put in and it had been proposed here to appropriate $1,200,000, somebody would have said it was a great expense; but we go on by degrees, and in this very bill is $150,000 for the harbor at Cleveland, being a part of the $1,200,000, or whatever it may finally turn out to be when the harbor is completed. So these reports, as the Senator from Minnesota very properly says, are of necessity brief.

Now let me turn to the report read by the Senator from Connecticut, made in 1875. I read now from volume 2, part 2, of the Engineer's report for 1875-'76, page 525. Colonel Macomb states:

In considering the Hennepin Canal as a part of the water-communication desired for connecting some point on the Mississippi River, near Rock Island, with Lake Michigan, at Chicago, it appears that the basin at Hennepin is about 100 feet below the level of the Mississippi River in the vicinity of Rock Island—and nearly 140 feet below the level of Lake Michigan.

It is 100 feet below the level of the Mississippi at Rock Island—

So that you have a fall between Hennepin and Lake Michigan, which is an inexhaustible reservoir, I will say to my friend from Connecticut, of 140 feet, and that is the way water will get into the river Illinois when this improvement is completed.

A survey was made to ascertain if the lockage required to pass this depression of the Hennepin basin could be avoided. This survey led to the conclusion that, on every account, the Hennepin Canal and Upper Illinois River, and enlarged canal from Joliet to Chicago, will afford the best through route for navigation between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan that can be secured in this vicinity.

Ought not that to be satisfactory?

Mr. HAWLEY. Do I understand that there is no feeder required?

Mr. ALLISON. I will come to the feeder question presently. This is Colonel Macomb's statement:

In the estimates originally made for a commercial canal, due consideration was not given to the necessity of having the locks large enough to pass such barges as are used for freight on the Upper Mississippi, and I therefore caused estimates to be prepared for locks of one hundred and seventy feet in length and thirty feet in width, which will increase the estimate for the Hennepin Canal, or third division of the route, by some $641,284.

And that sum is added to the $3,900,000. Colonel Macomb states that in order to pass the barges that are in use upon the Mississippi River it is necessary to have a lock thirty feet wide rather than a lock twenty-one feet wide; but since this report was made the barge width on the Mississippi River has been changed in a great degree, and I am told by the best informed people that a lock twenty-one feet wide will enable the barges now in use on the Mississippi River from Saint Paul to go through to Chicago without breaking bulk if this Hennepin Canal is built. That may not be a desirable thing; it may not be a desirable thing to have communication with Chicago direct from Saint Paul by means of this canal; that is for the Senate to say. I think it is.

Mr. BUTLER. If it does not interrupt the Senator, I should like to call his attention to a difference in the estimate made by Mr. Low, civil engineer, and the dimensions of this canal as provided in this amendment. As I understand, his estimate is based on a canal sixty feet wide, and this provides that the canal shall be seventy feet wide.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will bear in mind that I said that there was a variation, as engineers make slight variations, just as they do in Charleston Harbor, if my friend will not be offended by my referring to that. When Mr. Doran made his report under instructions from Colonel Macomb, he was not instructed to go into the Hennepin question again; he was instructed to make an estimate for the enlargement of the Illinois and Mississippi Canal and not to look into the question of the Hennepin Canal. However, he says in this report I call attention to, page 530:

November 14 I received an order to resurvey a part of the western division of the Hennepin Canal route, and to examine the country lying between the Rock and the Mississippi Rivers.

The Rock and the Mississippi Rivers at that point are probably eight miles apart. Why did Colonel Macomb give him that order? For the purpose of having a more accurate survey of the Hennepin route? Not at all. He states why—

The survey to be conducted especially with a view to ascertain the most favorable point on the river at which to establish the western terminus of this route.

Colonel Macomb did not think it worth while to resurvey this route in 1875, because under the orders of Congress in 1871 and 1872 one of his engineers had made a very careful survey, and all he asked this engineer to do was to resurvey the western terminus of this canal. Here is the report made by the engineer under instructions to Colonel Macomb.

I repeat what I have said hitherto about Colonel Macomb; he is one of the best engineers and one of the most careful engineers in the Army, and one having the longest experience probably with one or two exceptions of all the engineers in the country, and Colonel Macomb sent this careful engineer to make this survey.

Why was it that a survey was made for a ship-canal? It was because the law directed such a survey. The law of 1870, which we passed, directed that a survey for a ship-canal should be made from Hennepin along to the Mississippi River, and Colonel Macomb of course gave his instructions to carry out that view, but he did instruct Mr. Doran to ascertain what the cost of a commercial canal would be, and he makes that report. My friend from Connecticut finds fault with the fact that this engineer did not state in detail in this report why he thought it would only cost $3,900,000 to make this canal. He says that he rather overestimated the cost. Of course that was a canal sixty feet wide with locks twenty-one feet in width. He gives the whole cost:

The eastern division, from the Illinois River to the feeder, is estimated to cost $1,467,202.44, or $56,736.37 per mile; the western division, from the feeder to the Mississippi, $1,429,708.50, or $36,241.03 per mile; the feeder, $1,002,811.79, or $26,306.71 per mile; making the total for the whole work $3,899,722.64, or $8,579,970.63 less than for the larger canal.

It could not have been a very imperfect and ad captandum survey that would get the figures down to sixty-four cents. He evidently made this survey for a commercial canal (I call the attention of my friend from Connecticut to that point) with some little degree of accuracy when he brought it down to a sixty-four-cent suggestion. He made it of course upon calculations of the cost of excavation and embankment and the cost of masonry, and so on. He says:

A tabular detailed statement of this estimate accompanies this report.

What does that mean?

Mr. BUTLER. Where is that?

Mr. ALLISON. Where is it? It is in that great reservoir called the War Department. Of course we do not haul down these reports. If we had the detailed statements here accompanying the reports, with respect to the items in this river and harbor bill, they would fill one-half the Senate Chamber. We do not call for these reports. Senators are not so exact in reference to other matters as they seem to be in reference to this Hennepin Canal. He refers to the very place where you can get accurate and detailed information, and he says he transmits it with his report:

The surveys were made wholly for the purpose of locating a canal 160 feet wide, and the narrower section would probably admit of following the bluffs more closely and thus effect a large saving of earth-work.

There is the statement; and I submit to Senators that it is as full and in as much of detail as it is possible to make under the circumstances.

Now, one word with reference to the feeder. There seem to be some people somewhere about the Capitol who are interested in defeating this object; I do not know where they come from, and I do not even suggest where they come from; but I submit that gentlemen do not come into the Senate Chamber and circulate minority reports without having some occasion to do it. The Senator from Connecticut has fallen into an error which has been suggested from a minority report put upon his table doubtless, as it has been placed on mine.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the pleasure of saying that nobody under the sun has said a word to me against this canal. A great many have spoken to me in favor of it, and I have never seen any minority report.

Mr. BUTLER. That is precisely my experience. I have not heard a human being say a word against it. I have received many communications in favor of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad the Senator has, because a great many communications have been sent in favor of it, and I am sorry Senators have not had more, because it is a thing that a great many people are deeply interested in, for they want if they can to cheapen the cost of the transportation of the great products of a region comprising one-third of the area of the States of this Union.

But I was calling attention to the question of the water-power. This engineer in estimating the water-power for a ship-canal to be used constantly did say that there would be a lack of water from the Rock River; but when you come to the question of water-power for a commercial canal only, I state upon my reputation that there is ample water-power for the use of this canal without disturbing in the slightest degree any manufacturing industry in the region of Rock River or any that is likely to be established there within the next century. There is an ample surplus of water-power there for their purposes.

That, then, has no relation whatever to this matter, and there is no question of damages. There may be some people who may want damages, but there can be no question of a reduction of water-power upon the basis of a commercial canal.

I submit to my friend from Connecticut that although he has not had and does not have from these reports that absolute accuracy which he may seek with reference to this improvement in order to enable him to vote intelligently, yet he must trust in these matters to the distinguished engineers of our country without going, and I would not undertake now to go, into an investigation of how many yards of embankment, how many yards of excavation, how many perches of stone are to be put into this canal. I cannot do that.

I must trust that to the trusted men of our Army whose business it is to make these calculations and to expend the public money in this regard and whose education enables them to do it with accuracy and, I am glad to say, with absolute integrity. We are asking that this work shall be done by the Government, and that it shall be done with the greatest care; that it shall not be done, however, by any portion of our people as a monopoly whereby money can be charged to the transportation of products, but that it shall be open to all the people who desire to use it for the purposes of transportation.

I submit that we have practically all the information that we can get upon this subject to vote intelligently.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I am substantially correct in saying that all we have in regard to this canal is half a page of the report of 1870, twelve years ago, and that that is subsidiary to the main purpose of the report then made, Low having been sent out by Macomb to survey for a large ship-canal and having afterward been orally, or as the engineer says, "verbally directed" to make an estimate for a commercial canal of smaller dimensions. That, therefore, is merely subsidiary and by way of appendix, and Macomb in transmitting it makes no recommendation whatever to the Government concerning it. He says it will be of interest to the canal commissioners of the State of Illinois. As to his big ship-canal, which he did send out men to estimate for, he says the great cost will probably prevent the Government from undertaking the work.

One more point. The Senator from Iowa said nothing about the land damages. I take it, of course, we expect something to be paid for land damages. The engineers make no calculations as to the commercial value of these enterprises; that is not their duty. They do not undertake to tell us how many boats will go over; how much the lockage will cost; how much the annual maintenance will be; what the probable benefit to the regions of country surrounding will be. That they consider a little out of their field. They confine themselves to the technical engineering work only.

Now, as I understand, in one place there are 409 feet of rise and fall, and in another I understand, rather from the Senator from Iowa himself, that they are to go up about 207 feet and come down 92 feet. There are twelve large locks up and nine down.

I should like to know how much it is going to cost. One of these boats carries about the contents of an ordinary freight-train, and it has got to be lifted two hundred and seven feet and taken down ninety-two feet in going seventy-seven miles. All these things are matters of cold calculation to business men. If the Hennepin Canal seventy-seven miles long would cost only $4,000,000 and promised a great profit, many of the enterprising capitalists of the East would have put their money there long ago instead of throwing it away in Nevada and other silver-mines. I am willing to be convinced on a good thorough estimate, commercial as well as engineering.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. Before that motion is put I should like to submit an amendment to this amendment, with a view of having it considered to-morrow.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I suppose we cannot finish the bill to-night, and it will be the unfinished business to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I submit to the Senate the following amendment to the amendment of the committee:

Strike out all after the word "surveys," in line 1091, and insert in lieu of what is stricken out in that paragraph "and that the annual cost of the maintenance of said canal when completed shall be estimated for and accompany the report of the said survey." Then retain all from and including lines 1098 to 1107; then strike out all after the word "commenced," in line 1107 to line 1193, inclusive; and in line 1194, insert after the word "dollars," "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

I submit the amendment, which I will hand to the Secretary.

Mr. LAPHAM. Before the motion is put I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to line 84 of this bill, where there is a clerical error which ought to be corrected. The words "by removal of sunken rock" have been inadvertently inserted, following a prior appropriation which was for the purpose of removing rocks. The rocks have now been removed, and if it is thus limited it will destroy the force of the appropriation. I ask that those words be stricken out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The committee have made no amendment to that clause of the bill. That is the language of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. LAPHAM. Certainly it is; and my colleague, who had charge of it, being absent, by inadvertence it has not been noticed.

Mr. CONGER. That amendment can be made hereafter.

Mr. LAPHAM. Very well.

Mr. INGALLS. I insist on my motion.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the Senator will allow me to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be understood.

Mr. INGALLS. That will appear on the Journal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the river and harbor bill. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor. The unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside for the river and harbor bill.

Mr. INGALLS. It is important that we should have an executive session. I ask that the question be put on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 6, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. No. 835) to restore certain portions of the Fort Niobrara military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, to the public domain, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I am compelled to object.

Mr. O'NEILL. Is it designed to have the unanimous consent go around?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to do so.

Mr. O'NEILL. The House is not half full, and we might do a great deal of business by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is the regular order demanded?

Mr. O'NEILL. Nobody has demanded it.

BRIDGES OVER PEARL RIVER, LOUISIANA.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage Senate bill (No. 1960) authorizing the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad to construct bridges over the channels of Pearl River and Lake Pontchartrain.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad Company, a corporation organized for the purpose of constructing a railroad between New Orleans, Louisiana, and Meridian, Mississippi, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to construct, build, and maintain bridges over and across the navigable waters of the United States on the route of said railroad from New Orleans, Louisiana, to Meridian, Mississippi, as now located, or as said route may hereafter be located, for the use of said company, and the passage of its engines, cars, passengers, mails, and merchandise thereon: Provided, however, That said company shall construct its bridges over and across the waters known as East Pearl River, West Pearl River, and Lake Pontchartrain, in accordance with such plans devised for the safe passage of vessels as shall be approved by the Secretary of War; and that said company shall construct and maintain such facilities and be governed by such regulations for the passage of vessels as the Secretary of War shall approve.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for passengers and freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

SEC. 3. That if said bridges shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, the spans thereof shall not be less than three hundred feet in length in the clear, and the main spans shall be over the main channels of the rivers and lakes across which said bridges may be constructed, and the bridges shall be at right angles to and their piers parallel with the current of said rivers and lakes: Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as draw-bridges, the draws or pivots shall be over the main channels of said rivers and lakes at accessible points, and the spans shall not be less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear, and the piers of said bridges shall be parallel with and the bridges at right angles to the current of the channels, and the spans shall not be less than ten feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridges: Provided, That said draws shall be opened promptly by said company, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridges as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said rivers and lakes; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, obstruct such navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridges. And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said rivers caused or alleged to be caused by said bridges, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt these bridges from the operation of the same.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridges shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridges and the several railroad companies, or any one of them, desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridges, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 2 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridges shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridges by said companies for the use of said bridges.

SEC. 5. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said rivers and lakes as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridges and a map of the location, giving for the space of one mile above and one mile below the proposed location the topography of the banks of the river or lake, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream or lake, the location of any bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridges are approved by the Secretary of War the bridges shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridges during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structures, or their entire removal, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interest requires it, is also expressly reserved.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. This bill, I will explain briefly, has been passed by the Senate and is in the exact form of the other bills of this character which have been passed by the House. The plans, specifications, and diagrams of the bridges have to be submitted to the Secretary of War and receive his approval before their building is permitted; and all power necessary to alter, change, or amend the law is reserved in the bill. The interests of commerce and the Government are fully preserved and every precaution taken to guard the public interests in connection with the matter.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read by its title a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and pass at this time Senate bill No. 1549——

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ANDERSON. This is simply a relief bill.

Mr. UPSON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED. I would like to have an opportunity to get before the House one or two bills of public interest.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded will prevent the recognition of any gentleman to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. O'NEILL. Can I not ask unanimous consent to pass a private bill?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted upon.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand the gentleman from Texas withdraws the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the regular order as having been demanded by other gentlemen.

COMMON PRIME MERIDIAN.

Mr. BELMONT. I rise to a privileged motion. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution H. R. No. 209:

Joint resolution to authorize the President of the United States to call an international conference to fix on and recommend for universal adoption a common prime meridian to be used in the reckoning of longitude and in the regulation of time throughout the world.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution, the title of which has just been read.

Mr. BELMONT. I have called this joint resolution up, Mr. Speaker, for the second time, and I now make this motion to reconsider the former action of the House with reference to it for the reason that I believe there was some misapprehension on the former occasion when I introduced it, possibly owing to my own fault. When the gentleman from Kentucky made some suggestions about the possible result of this commission, that their action might require the reconstruction of all our present maps and charts, I was under the impression that the gentleman was objecting to the consideration at that time and that the House had refused unanimous consent which I had asked. Instead of that, however, the objection was of the character I have just stated, and the House proceeded to a vote upon the joint resolution, as I believe, under a misapprehension, nothing having been said in favor of it. I do not know that there is anything that I can now say that will have much effect in influencing the judgment of the House——

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was given by the House for the consideration of the joint resolution, but the House refused to order its engrossment and third reading. It is now the motion to reconsider that vote which is pending.

Mr. BELMONT. It was my mistake——

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BELMONT. I only desire to say that the joint resolution had the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and some such statement in reference to it was due to the House on the former occasion; but, as I have just said, I was under a misapprehension as to the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the motion to reconsider will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the joint resolution to its engrossment and third reading.

The motion was reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. FLOWER. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution was introduced by myself and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. There are over three thousand scientists in this country who ask the passage of this resolution. It was drawn up by General Hazen and is distinctively an American measure. If this convention is not convened by us it will be by other nations. It will not cost the Government one dollar.

Mr. CARLISLE. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he will not accept such an amendment to this joint resolution as will provide for the appointment of these delegates by the President either from the officers of the Navy or from the Engineer Corps? These are already paid by the Government of the United States, and there is no necessity for subjecting the Treasury to additional expense in the selection of such a board from outside scientists, when officers capable of performing the service are already being paid by the Government. We have a board of competent officers connected with the Observatory, the Coast Survey, and the Engineer Corps of the Army, from whom such selections could be made.

Mr. KASSON. The scientific people of the country are almost unanimous in their recommendations touching the importance of this matter. I have a letter myself from President Barnard, of Columbia College, New York, and have seen papers from others who suggest that it should be left to the discretion of the President to select this board.

Mr. CARLISLE. Still, if some one already in the service and pay of the Government is not selected, this will be followed up at some future time by a bill or joint resolution to pay out a large amount.

Mr. KASSON. The amount cannot be large; it will be very small, if any.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not think that necessarily any compensation will be paid to the delegates. The delegates from foreign governments will, of course, look to their own governments. Our own delegates will only be three in number.

Mr. FLOWER. I desire to have printed as part of my remarks the report submitted by my colleague [Mr. BELMONT] from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred joint resolution No. 209, authorizing the President to call an international congress to fix and recommend a common prime meridian, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

There is at present no common and accepted standard for the computation of time for other than astronomical purposes. In the absence of agreement serious embarrassments are felt in the ordinary affairs of modern commerce, especially since the widespread extension of telegraphic communication and railroad transportation, and, owing to the diversity of methods now in use for indicating points on the earth's surface, navigators, geographers, and all who have occasion to use charts or maps, are put to the greatest inconvenience. International agreement upon this subject is demanded more imperatively every day, both by science and by trade. We have had as provisional or partial standards the meridians of Alexandria, the Canary Islands, Toledo, Cracow, Uranbourg, Copenhagen, Goes, Pisa, London, Paris, Rome, Greenwich, Vienna, Ulm, Berlin, Nuremberg, Venice, Bologna, Augsburg, Rouen, Dantzig, Milan, Washington, and other places. As long ago as the time of Richelieu an attempt was made to put an end to the confusion arising out of so great a variety of usages, and a congress was invited to assemble in Paris, in 1630, to agree, if possible, upon a common meridian. In speaking of this congress, Professor Barnard, of Columbia College, says:

"The island of Ferro, the most southwesterly of the Canary Islands, was fixed upon, and a royal order establishing this decision was promulgated in July of the same year. Unfortunately, however, the exact latitude of Ferro with reference to any point on the continent of Europe was at that time unknown. The determination of its position was never made by authority, and at length, in 1724, it was resolved to assume it as 20° west from Paris. To name the island, therefore, without naming the point in it, was to leave the meridian unfixed, even had its general position been better known; at any rate this effort to establish uniformity was without practical result."

The Government has by section 435 of the Revised Statutes adopted the Greenwich meridian for nautical purposes, but the establishment of the Meteorological Bureau and Signal-Service system, with postal and other stations extending over nearly four hours of solar time in North America, has already compelled the adoption of the standard time of 7.35 a. m. at Washington, as the moment of making telegraphic reports from all stations, and the observations on our naval vessels are made at the same hour of Washington time. There is already pending in this Congress a measure (H. R. 5969) for securing national standard time to our ports of entry and principal cities. This would accomplish what is desired in the regulation of time in the United States, and might be incorporated in any internal system to be adopted, but the remaining points as to the construction of charts and the reckoning of longitudes would require the concurrence of other nations, and could only be determined by an international convention.

The propositions embodied in this resolution have been discussed in this country and in Europe by various commercial and scientific bodies, and the necessity for an international convention is generally conceded. At the recent meeting in Cologne and Venice the idea of holding such a convention in Washington was very much favored. It is obvious that the United States having the greatest extent of continuous longitudinal area of any country traversed by railway, postal, and telegraph lines, should take the initiative in a movement so important to science and to the world's commerce. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLOWER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. UPSON] has withdrawn his objection to the consideration of the bill called up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Was not the regular order called for by the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the call for the regular order was withdrawn.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I renew it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman not to insist on the regular order. The Chair has already recognized me.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS FROM THE FILES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in possession of a communication from the Clerk of the House on the subject of the withdrawal of papers from the files under the rules of the House. If there be no objection the communication will be referred to the Committee on Rules, and will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., July 5, 1882.

SIR: The remarks made in the House on Saturday respecting the "withdrawal of papers" from the files suggest this communication.

This office strictly enforces the rule of the House on this subject, which is as follows:

"No memorial or other paper presented to the House shall be withdrawn from its files without its leave, and if so withdrawn therefrom certified copies thereof shall be left in the office of the Clerk."

It has been the uniform ruling of this office that the permission to withdraw covers only papers belonging to the claimant, and in no case applies to papers obtained from the Departments. If any papers of the latter class have been withdrawn it has not been done through this office, or any one connected with it.

The old rule required that all motions to withdraw papers from the files of the House "shall be referred to the committee which last considered the case, who shall report without delay whether or not copies shall be left on file; but original papers shall not be withdrawn in any case where an adverse report has been made, and whenever the report is adverse the same shall be in writing, and ordered to be printed."

Under the present rule there is no intervention of a committee, but the consent of the House obtained through the Chair, and in the inevitable absence of explanation is an absolute authority for withdrawal. This change in the rule has undoubtedly facilitated the withdrawal of papers, and has materially weakened the safeguards which should surround the files. It is a matter of observation that permission to withdraw papers is frequently asked and given at the request of parties who anticipate an adverse report from the committee in charge, and who seek by the withdrawal of the papers and the consequent discharge of the committee from their consideration, to prevent that action. If the requests for the withdrawal of papers were referred to the committee having them in charge, this abuse could not exist.

When leave has been given to withdraw papers which are in the possession of a committee of the House it frequently happens that the party in interest applies for and procures such papers from the clerk of the committee having them in charge, and the protection of the files in each such case is therefore the discretion of the clerks of the respective committees, who may or may not surrender departmental papers, who may or may not keep copies, and who may or may not take specific receipts for return to and preservation in the Clerk's office. It rarely happens that the withdrawal of papers is asked except for a strong personal reason, which is often inconsistent with the interest of the public service; and the readiness with which this consent is given is leading to the gradual depletion of the files of the House. Whatever authority is vested in this office to protect them I will gladly exercise, but under the existing rule and practice this authority is very slight.

In no instance has this office failed under the new rule to require the leaving of certified copies of papers withdrawn through it, or to offer all proper facilities for the making of these copies without expense to the claimant; but I am unable to say how generally the rule has been observed in the case of withdrawals from the committees of the House.

My observation of the effects of the present system during this session leads to the conclusion that it is singularly defective; that better safeguards should be thrown around the files; and that the jurisdiction of a committee over the question of withdrawal, while it will involve some labor and vexation, will supply a very important protection both against a multiplicity of applications and the granting of incautious and injurious consent.

Very respectfully, yours,

EDWD. McPHERSON,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Hon. J. WARREN KEIFER,
Speaker House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to withdraw the call for the regular order, that I may introduce a joint resolution for reference.

Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw the demand for the regular order, that the bill called up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] may be read.

WILLIAM J. POLLOCK.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1549) for the relief of William J. Pollock be taken from the Speaker's table and be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized, in settling the accounts of William J. Pollock, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Pennsylvania, to credit said Pollock with the amount, not exceeding the sum of $3,433.33, of the unused coupons attached to the stubs of special-tax stamps deposited by him in the post-office at Philadelphia, February 12, 1875, but lost in transmission to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the city of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope unanimous consent will be given to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain the bill, the right to object being reserved.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state that this bill has been reported three times from the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously. It has now passed the Senate, and the same bill has been again reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. The committee find that the coupons are—

Of no actual value to any one but said Pollock, and only to him for the purpose of obtaining proper credit at the Treasury Department in the final adjustment of his accounts as collector.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue states:

I have to say that, from the evidence filed here, the claim is believed to be an eminently meritorious one, and if this office were authorized by law to make an allowance in such cases, the evidence is of so conclusive a character that I have no hesitation in saying that the claim would be promptly allowed.

They are simply the unused coupons.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill is right and ought to pass.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the motion by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UPSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration Senate bill No. 1620.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED. I hope the regular order will not be called. Let us get through these personal bills.

Mr. UPSON. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw the call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted on.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot submit the request against the demand for the regular order.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendments. The first amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume it is in order to move now to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the Chair decide it is too late to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. It is not too late; the time has not arrived. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] last evening demanded a separate vote on each of the amendments. Is that insisted on? If no separate vote is demanded, the question will be put on agreeing to the several amendments, not yet concurred in by the House, reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question being taken, the amendments were concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ROBESON. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. ROBESON move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON and Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to submit his motion to recommit at this time, or at the close of the debate? The Chair will state, one motion to recommit is still in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit that motion.

The SPEAKER. Now?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to add——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that it might be well for him to wait until after the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] submits his remarks. The House is rather thin at this time.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from New Jersey prefers proceeding now, I will withhold for the present the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] has not indicated whether he desired to proceed now or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to say that he preferred to submit his motion now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to add to the paragraph relating to the completion of certain work on the iron-clads the provision which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the work to be done on the said iron-clad vessels respectively shall be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, by and under contracts let to the lowest responsible bidder, after due advertisement for proposals, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; but advertisements inviting such proposals shall be published in newspapers of general circulation in at least three cities of the United States, and for not less than sixty days. And the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe the terms of the contracts which shall be made, the security to be given, and all regulations and supervision necessary to secure the full performance of such contracts and the proper completion of such work.

But valid and legal contracts now existing touching any part of said work shall not be affected by this provision.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 104, not voting 110; as follows:

Mr. BELFORD with Mr. BLACKBURN.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the passage of the bill, upon which the previous question has been ordered. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. ROBESON. I will do so.

COMMITTEE CLERKS, PAGES, ETC.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 253) in relation to committee-clerks, pages, and other employés of the Senate and House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

FISHERIES REPORT.

Mr. VAN HORN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, instructed to print, in quarto form, a report by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries upon the food-fishes and the fisheries of the United States; the engravings to be in relief, and to be contracted for by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, and to receive the approval of the Commissioner before being accepted; the work to be stereotyped, and 5,500 extra copies printed, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House, and 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries. There shall also be printed 1,000 extra copies for sale by the Public Printer, under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the cost of publication and 10 per cent. thereon added.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] to yield to me to have a short Senate bill taken up and passed.

Mr. ROBESON. I have agreed to yield for any report; but I must decline to yield for the purpose of allowing any bill to be considered. I should be delighted to accommodate the gentleman, but he will excuse me.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this bill, it becomes me, before it is finally submitted for the action of the House, to reiterate somewhat in detail the policy it embodies, the evils it seeks to remedy, and the results which it attempts to produce. An establishment like the Navy, in the discharge of duties entirely outside of and apart from the ordinary business and common interests of the people, is very apt to be misunderstood, if not wholly unnoticed and unappreciated in the progress of national development. An official establishment, absolutely necessary in time of war, but the daily necessity of which is not so apparent in peace, is apt not to receive proper consideration from the ignorant or the thoughtless, who neither take the trouble to understand its duty nor are able to appreciate its value. Let me then say at once that the naval organization is maintained in time of peace for use in time of war. Our experience has shown that ours is essentially a military people; that it needs but the call of patriotism or honor to fill our armies with the active and the brave, and to command them with intelligent and competent officers.

But the naval officer, competent to command a ship in its navigation of the seas, to control its machinery, to insure its safety, to develop its power, and to achieve its full success as a warlike engine, is the result of careful education and strict discipline, through the severe training of long years of service.

Therefore, it is far more necessary that we keep up a complete naval organization in time of peace than that a large army should be maintained. Besides, materials of naval warfare are so costly in their character, in their nature so expensive of time and money, so slow in their construction and preparation, that it is wise economy and prudent precaution, in time of profound peace and prosperity, deliberately to organize and prepare these great establishments of national defense against the time when they are needed for our safety or our honor. Let us remember the advice of the Father of his Country, so often quoted on this floor, "In time of peace prepare for war," and those additional words, equally wise, but not so well known, "taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments in a respectable defensive position, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies."

But, Mr. Speaker, we must be careful lest such an organization as I have described is allowed to grow with its own growth until it becomes cumbersome and unwieldy, a source of weakness, deterioration, and destruction to itself and of useless expense to the country. The growth of a great system like this, established for the honor and ingrafted in the affections of the people, is unperceived in the lapse of years, and almost insensibly to its friends and to itself it goes on swelling in numbers and in pretensions until it stumbles in its progress and topples in its overgrown weakness.

At the conclusion of the late war the acknowledged value to the country of the naval service inaugurated a large increase of its force, and a large increase of rank to its members. The generous heart of the country, grateful for their services, responded freely to their desires, and through the progress of years from that time to this the organization has grown year by year, until it has become too large for our present necessities and too unwieldy for our present use.

This growth of the personnel of the service, extraordinary and as it seems to us useless, requires a great expenditure of money for its payment and support. The result is, and here I desire the attention of the Representatives of the country, that more than three-fourths of all the appropriations for the naval service is expended for the maintenance of the personnel, the officers and men of the Navy, their comfort, their convenience, their instruction, and the performance of their duties; whereas but a small amount of the appropriations year by year is expended for the maintenance of the Navy itself. Out of appropriations of fourteen or fifteen million dollars yearly not more last year than two millions and a half went to the maintaining and strengthening of the Navy itself. The yearly appropriation for pay alone is over $7,000,000. Add to that clothing, provisions, transportation, houses, civil establishments, medicine, instruction, and the arming and equipping of ships when built, together with all those necessary appliances of a great system and all these make the extraordinary expenditure which the people generally and naturally suppose, and which is often charged in the columns of newspapers and on the lips of irresponsible orators to be an extravagant expenditure of the Department itself for its ordinary purposes. In fact, it is only the expenditure according to law for pay, provisions, &c., and the rest of the appropriation spent for the Navy itself is often not more than two or three million dollars—rarely if ever over $4,000,000. With this sum our Navy is to be kept afloat, our navy-yards maintained, our wooden ships patched, our engines rebuilt, our boilers repaired, and the general scientific and professional duties of the service performed and paid for, so that only the small surplus, eked out from the appropriation by practical administration, can be applied to the increase of the naval power itself.

I that speak to you, who occupied the position of the head of the Navy Department for nearly eight years, have often been charged by the ignorant, the malicious, and the false with expending enormous sums of money which were in fact never even appropriated. I believe it has been reported in the organs of that interest which I have above characterized, that I had stolen, I think, $265,000,000. I believe I saw that insignificant figure once in the head-lines of a New York newspaper, representing the views of those who attacked me. Mark how bald the misrepresentation, how gratuitous the lie, since in fact the whole sum of all the appropriations made for the whole Navy during the whole time I was at the head of the Department was less than $153,000,000; and of that appropriation only about $43,000,000 were, during that whole course of eight years, appropriated to the Bureau of Steam-Engineering and the Bureau of Construction and Repair—the working bureaus of the Department. Thus for eight years, shortly after the close of the war, with a navy exhausted by a tremendous struggle, with ships built of white-oak timber fresh cut in the forest, with worn-out engines, with great masses of useless machinery, used up, broken, and useless, with all the extravagance of the war piled upon the Department, with gold at a premium of 30 per cent. when that administration commenced—all that was expended for every purpose in the Navy Department, through the working Bureaus of Steam-Engineering and Construction, amounted during those eight years to a little over $43,000,000, for all the purposes of maintenance, repair, construction, and increase of naval vessels of all kinds.

It is impossible, in the short time for which it is proper to detain the House, to go into details upon the particular objects of naval expenditure. I could myself scarcely recall them, and you would not understand their details. But the question between reckless extravagance and practical administration may be fully tested upon broader principles by simpler processes. The practical means at command will be a comparison of the cost of my administration, in view of its circumstances and its results, with those which immediately preceded and which have followed it. Here is a test which appeals to the judgment of practical men, which will arrest the attention of the business community, and which the least intelligent may understand. It will be remembered that the two administrations of the Navy Department immediately preceding the war were in the hands of trusted Democratic officials, and that the administration which followed my own during the last five years has been carried on under the eye of the persons who have all the while been engaged in attacking me, and has been the enforced representative of their policy in its workings and in its results. Let us apply to each the test of actual expenditure and practical results. "By their fruits ye shall know them," is a maxim of high sanction which applies to all.

During the eight years of my administration, from 1869 to 1877, the sum of all the appropriations for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, the building bureau of the Department, was $31,726,000. This included about $1,000,000 applied to the construction of the steam-engines and boilers of the eight new sloops, so that in round numbers and including all the extraordinary expenditures made necessary by the excitement of the threatened war with Spain at the time of the Virginius massacre and subsequently, the actual appropriation for this Bureau of Construction during my administration was less than $31,000,000. During the eight years immediately preceding the war, from 1853 to 1861, under the Democratic administrations of Pierce and Buchanan, while Mr. Dobbin and Mr. Toucey, respectively, were Secretaries of the Navy, when steam-vessels of war were little known and our Navy contained only a few side-wheel steamers and one or two ships with auxiliary steam-power; when the bulk of our force was made up of sailing ships with no engines, no machinery, and comparatively no expenditure for the fuel, officers, and employés required for the use, repair, and removal of the same; when the military roster was far smaller than at present, and the civil list scarcely half as great, the sum of the appropriations for the Bureau of Construction and Repair alone were $33,566,000, or at least $2,500,000 more than was spent by that bureau during my whole administration; and that, too, in piping times of peace, when our money was good, our credit at a premium, and while the Navy and the country were under the economical control of Democratic policy.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, time will not permit me to enter into the details of all that was done or left undone during the eight years of my administration. The hour allotted to me would not avail to repeat, much less to attempt to refute, the slanders upon me and upon the service which have been hashed and rehashed, here and in the newspapers, and served hot and cold to suit the taste of changing times. I can, as I have said, only try these questions by the test of the general means provided and the general results obtained, and present these unquestioned and unquestionable propositions as a firm foundation for right opinion and just judgment by Congress and the country. I repeat, $31,000,000, during my eight years, of steamers, machinery, boilers, gold at a premium, threatened war, and the immense establishment and accustomed extravagance inherited from the rebellion, against $33,500,000 for the eight years immediately preceding the war.

During that time there were built, in my administration, built or effectually repaired, and practically added to the Navy, or saved from destruction, not less than forty-two ships. Ten were built absolutely, namely, the eight new sloops of war and the Intrepid and Alarm. Two more were bought and twelve others were rebuilt, as it was called; and as I have been criticised for that by gentlemen who, if they do not display their malevolence, certainly illustrate their ignorance on these subjects, I will explain what this means. The law provides that there shall be no two ships of the same name in the service, and when it is found proper to preserve an old and honored name and at the same time to rebuild substantially the old ship, this rebuilding is often commenced while she is in service, sometimes while she is actually at sea; and this action it is the custom of the service, and always has been its practice, to call rebuilding, as the rebuilding of the Constitution, (she was rebuilt three times, once under my administration,) and the rebuilding of the Marion, of the Vandalia, of the Swatara, of the Quinnebaug, and of the Galena.

I cited yesterday the law authorizing this, and it is conclusive upon the subject. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized, without specific authority or without specific appropriation, if he has money enough to do it, to proceed to the construction of any new ship he pleases. And for the purpose of maintaining the old and honored associations of the Navy, at the same time that he pursues a practical and economical policy, he usually, when he desires to retain the name of an old ship and yet build a new one, calls it "rebuilding." The list of old ships thus practically replaced by new and superior ones contains many time-honored names. The Constitution, the John Adams, the Princeton, and the Franklin are a few only of the most marked instances.

But to return to the ships. Twelve of them were thus rebuilt. Eighteen others were so substantially repaired as to be as good as new; some of them, it is true, as the gentleman from New York complains, with their engines and machinery built in the workshop while the ship was twenty miles away, and some with their iron beams and plates rolled and even their wooden frames hewed out when the ship was not present. With eight navy-yards on the Atlantic coast, and employing at the same time the skilled labor of the great ship-yards of the country, we did not establish our workshops in the hulls of the ships that we desired to rebuild even while their namesakes were in actual service. I give that as a complete answer to the unmeaning fling of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

In addition to these forty-two ships thus made actually or substantially new, almost all of the ships of the Navy that were really worth anything were more or less repaired, and the result was that the Navy, at the close of my administration, was in far better condition, in every respect, than at its commencement.

I do not ask you to rely upon my own statement upon this subject, but I quote from the report of Hon. Mr. Harris on the naval investigation of 1876 the statements which prove this conclusion:

> Taken in connection with the facts stated by Commodore Ammen, Captain Shufeldt, Constructor Hanscom, and others, and the statements published in the testimony showing beyond doubt that the present Navy is in a vastly better condition than it was in 1869, we think this comparison of the testimony relied upon by the majority of the committee to justify their extravagant charges is a fair illustration of the soundness and value of their conclusions.
> The real fact is that during the last five years, besides building eight new sloops and two torpedo-boats, the Department has almost entirely rebuilt the Navy; almost all its efficient ships have been put in good condition; several of its most convenient cruisers, which would otherwise have been wholly lost to the service, are rebuilt of live-oak; the whole fleet of monitors, which before could not fire a gun, has been put in a state of permanent efficiency, and its powerful double-turreted iron-clads are in progress of thorough repair.
> * * * * * * *
> The condition of the ships in 1869 and 1876, respectively, was as follows:
> In 1869 there were in good condition only 12 vessels, while in 1876 there are 70 vessels; in 1869 there were in that condition known as fair 25 vessels, while in 1876 there are only 14; in 1869 there were wanting important repairs 24, in 1876 only 16; in 1869 there were wanting extensive repairs 76, in 1876 only 15; there were in 1869 unfit for repairs 58 vessels, and in 1876 there were only 10.

> The credit for this improved condition of our Navy is due to the present Secretary, and yet the majority are so unfair and partisan in their statements that they cannot accord to him this credit which, in our opinion, he so fully deserves.

I have thus shown in comparison the appropriations and expenditures for the eight years preceding the war, and the appropriations and expenditures during my administration, for I seek to compare nothing with the extraordinary and wholly abnormal conditions of the war itself or of the two or three years which immediately followed it.

I will now try this question by another test, which cannot be called unfair. I mean by the test of the appropriations and the results of the last five years, comprising the time which has elapsed since I left the Department. In the few remarks which I had the honor to submit upon this bill the other day, I said that for the five years which had elapsed since I left office there had been $73,000,000 spent without result under the policy inaugurated and maintained by the opinion which is represented by the gentleman from New York and the member from Tennessee. I desire to be wholly within the mark, and therefore I repeat from the official statements the amount which I then alluded to generally. The real amount expended since the 1st day of July, 1877, up to the 1st day of July, 1882, is $76,701,722.16.

We were reminded on the floor yesterday that there was a deficiency when I left office. This is true. There was a deficiency, but what was the cause of it? I had made contracts to finish these iron-clads, which this House has voted half a dozen times during the last week to sustain, and had proposed to finish them; but the party in power and in control of this House at the time I left office, under the lead or at the instigation of men who cared nothing for the country or its defense if they could accomplish a party purpose, who recked not of private character or individual honor if they could achieve a political end or fulfill a personal enmity, refused during the last two years of my administration to make the necessary appropriation to carry these contracts into effect. The contracts were made and entered into in good faith, as has been proven by half a dozen investigations, but the appropriations were not made to carry them out, and therefore when I retired from office a deficiency of about $2,300,000 in round numbers existed, and was afterward supplied by Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman from New Jersey; but I feel, sir, it is due to myself that he should allow me to say in this connection that for the last two years, having had the honor of reporting this naval appropriation bill, and having failed to recommend an appropriation to finish the monitors, it is proper that I should say the failure to do so was not on account of any partisan purpose whatever.

Mr. ROBESON. I acquit the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] thoroughly. He is a man of too high honor and too good character himself either to be a party to partisan attack or to suspect the motives or malign the conduct of others. I have a high respect for the gentleman, and I wish now to thank him for the cordiality and good spirit with which he has accepted our feeble efforts to effect a reform in this service. I thoroughly understand the difficulties that were in his way, and I repeat that I acquit him most heartily of anything except the strictest performance of his duty along the line which he conceived that it carried him.

But, to return to my statement, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that there has been spent during the five years since I left office, exclusive of the deficiency to which I have referred, about $74,000,000, $12,400,000 of which were in the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam-Engineering, and yet there has not been during that period a new ship produced in any form or a new gun put afloat under the flag. I do not make this statement as an attack upon the administration of my successors. They could not help it. They could only pursue, with such means as was given them, the policy with regard to the Navy to which I have already alluded; a policy which was born of a natural, though perhaps in some instances unconscious, dislike of military establishments of the Government, and which has been carried on until they have been rendered almost inefficient, without appreciating the necessities of our country and apparently without regard to its interests or its honor. Under this policy during the last five years the appropriations for the Navy have been made strictly for house-keeping, little has been given that could be used to preserve the Navy itself from decay and destruction, and nothing for improvement or extension. The money has been expended in pay, in support of the military and civil establishment, in the navy-yards, in patching, mending, and repairing, and in all those little items of expenditure which are consumed in the ordinary occupation and the daily life of a great military establishment. There has not been a dollar appropriated that could be fairly expended in the real improvement of the Navy itself; and it is no attack upon my successors to say that they have been hampered by this policy enforced by the legislative department of the Government in making appropriations for the service. It would be still continued if we had not to-day successfully resisted and overcome the endeavors of the gentleman from New York and the member from Tennessee.

As a result of all this it will be seen that every ship that now floats bearing the American flag around the world, every ship that now carries a gun to respond to the demands of your Government, was built, rebuilt, or substantially repaired by me. All that there is of the American Navy to-day I built; and there is not one, not a single one of these ships, for the building of which I was not abused. You have not a ship to-day that carries your flag, not a single cruiser, monitor, or torpedo-boat upon which you must rely for the defense of your harbors or the vindication of your honor, that the same spirit which for the last week has stood in the way of this bill has not denounced and vilified me for building or preserving. For maintaining your interests with a constancy which became me I have been decorated with the censure of the weak, the thoughtless, and the partisan, and honored with the hatred of the malevolent and the disloyal. But I believe I did not shrink from or fail of my duty; and whatever there is of responsibility in the pursuit of a policy demanded by the interests of my country which is open to criticism, I am ready now, as I always have been ready, to assume and avow.

I am neither engineer nor constructor, ordnance officer nor naval expert, but the policy of maintaining the Navy of the country with such means as the national Legislature provided for that purpose, to the fullest extent of my power, without shrinking from the censure of the malevolent or the vicious, without falling back before the assaults of the ignorant, the interested, or the disloyal, I did accept then and do accept now. It was natural, perhaps, that many who were again admitted to a share in the Government should be hostile to and jealous of its military power, and almost unconsciously induced to assault and obstruct any policy looking to its improvement. I received these assaults and encountered these obstructions, but I am proud to say I neither wavered nor turned back. But one thing I must be permitted to say. That if I had courage in behalf of my country's welfare I was forced to be content with the approval of my own conscience, for my countrymen were not allowed to hear of, much less to understand it. The days of Gales and Blair, of Ritchie and Seaton, of Bailey, of Greeley, and of Raymond, are passed, and the avenues of public information from the capital of the nation are largely in the hands of men who have not the inclination to deal fairly with any question which assumes a party aspect, or who have neither the knowledge nor the experience necessary for the comprehension of broad principles or comprehensive policy.

It will be interesting, Mr. Speaker, to inquire into the circumstances which produced this condition of affairs in the American Navy. The origin of this policy, the motive of its inauguration, and the spirit in which it has been pursued will make an interesting chapter in American history. The era to which that chapter will refer will be as disgraceful as any since our Government began. It will tell how a great party, patriotic in its pretensions if not in its history, flushed with success and unaccustomed to the responsibilities of power, impelled by an unpatriotic sentiment which lurked in its organization and swayed in the hands of wicked and designing men, became a mighty instrument of evil to themselves, their country, and its citizens.

With the advent of the Forty-fourth Congress the Democratic party came into power in this House. Calling itself a Democratic Congress, it was used for the worst purposes of irresponsible tyranny. Professing to love the freedom of the people, it perpetrated the greatest wrongs upon the freedom of citizens and upon the rights of individual men; it prostituted the name of Democracy; it trampled upon the Constitution; it broke through the laws; it attacked individual rights and inflicted wrongs upon persons, property, and character which no individual man would have dared to attempt, which only strong political excitement availed to protect from universal condemnation, and from which most of the men who accepted and enforced it as members of the party would have shrunk with personal horror. In these days of calmness and candor it is difficult to realize the conditions of those times or to understand the spirit which controlled them. The secret of their origin, however, is not doubtful.

As the result of a national convention, the cipherer of Gramercy Park was put in nomination for the Presidency under the banner of "reform." The only sure way through which pretended reformers can find acceptance in the public mind is by attacking other people.

When "the Artful Dodger" was chased through the streets of London, after picking the pocket of the old gentleman, he was found round the first corner, at the head of the hue and cry, shouting "Stop, thief!" "Stop, thief!"

True to the teachings of this practicable philosophy, when the distinguished cipherer was put at the head of the great "reform movement," and all his cohorts of reform were rallied to sustain and assist him, it became at once necessary that an attack should be made upon every man who stood in a position prominent enough to warrant or invite it. A general assault was ordered along the whole line, and the Democratic column rushed to the conflict with a shout of fierce exultation, which sounded in the ears of the peaceable people of this country very like the "rebel yell" with which they had once been familiar, but which they had then almost forgotten.

The scent of carnage was on the air, and the field was like to be covered with the dying and the dead. Certain newspapers, the carrion birds of such a conflict, took up and echoed the cry. The Southern Annihilator and the Southwestern Tomahawk shouted aloud in their mad eagerness for the fray. The Western Buzzard, the National Cesspool, and the New York Scavenger reveled in anticipation of the filth in which they were to dip their dirty beaks, to satisfy their own foul hunger, and scatter the remains among the people to pander to a prurient public appetite. And the Northern Pecksniff and the New England Pharisee, born of the union of stock-jobbing and monopoly, prepared to depreciate everything and to denounce everybody, that they might themselves assume a high position as the representatives of honorable principles and assure the people that they were the agents of honorable purposes. It was, as I have said, a most disgraceful era in our history, and men are only now beginning, in the light of legal judgments and popular reaction, to realize the wrongs then done. Congressional investigation, with unlimited powers for personal or for party purposes, were then the regular order of every day. Reckless men, inspired with brutish instincts, were clothed with extraordinary powers to penetrate every man's private life and throw open the penetralia of his family circle to the unholy inspection of the vulgar and the malevolent.

The Navy Department, of which I was then the head, sustained the full brunt of the fiercest assault. Passing the sphere of legitimate investigation its tide was turned against myself individually—my father's grave was dishonored, my mother's dowry inquired into, my wife's estate investigated, my children's portions examined. The details of my household life and expenses were under this—how shall I characterize it—most brutal proceeding, held up for the examination of the world. I have no further words with which to describe it. I must leave it to your own conscientiousness to supply the picture.

And all this was done with the sanction, or at least with the acquiescence of the American Congress, and in the presence of the American people. I cannot recur to it without passion, or speak of it without feeling. But I thank God that it is not in my temperament to turn my back upon friend or foe, and that I was able for myself and for my party to stand my ground against the onset, more filthy and more tremendous than was ever poured upon any other man in our times.

It was, indeed, a trying moment. "Then shrieked the timid, and stood the brave." In the shock of that battle false friends fell off and new enemies came on, and with the cry of ravening wolves the concentrated force of a great party was precipitated upon the devoted head of a single individual, not because of himself, but because he stood in the breach and held the key of the defense. I would not charge all this without reservation upon the whole party which was then in power. I make much allowance for the infectious effect of excitement and passion. Men are most dangerously and strongly influenced and acted upon in masses, and we all know how often in the sweep of such judgments reason is subservient to passion. But in truth the American Congress and its power were upon this subject delivered into the hands of the most reckless and irresponsible of its members.

If there was a member of Congress lately in rebellion against the Government who, though early forgiven through its clemency, still retained in his malignant heart all his ancient malevolence against its institutions and its defenders, he was a proper representative of the political policy then inaugurated. If there was a man who, in his own State, had the accusation resting against him, true or false, of having stolen its school fund——

Mr. WHITTHORNE, (rising and advancing.) That is a lie, whoever tells it or repeats it——

Mr. ROBESON. If there was a man who had been accused at home, truthfully or falsely, of having, with his companions, carried off, in gold, the school fund of his State, and with them lived upon its proceeds during the closing years of the rebellion, his home reputation singled him out as a fit investigator of the charges then made.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. That is a lie.

Mr. PEELLE. I ask that the words of the member from Tennessee be taken down.

Mr. HOUSE. The words on the other side should be taken down.

Mr. ROBESON, (to Mr. PEELLE.) Never mind. I mean to keep strictly within the rules of parliamentary propriety. I have mentioned no one by name. If any man recognizes himself by the description, let him step forward and deny it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOUSE. That is not candid.

Mr. ROBESON. If there was a member of Congress the character of whose daily life was so dissolute and vicious that he had received among his associates a disgusting cognomen, synonymous of weakness and debauchery, he was the fit representative of the morality which was then to be illustrated. If there was any man so debased in his habits, so vile in his practices that he considered it a personal attack when the police of the city watched and raided upon the lowest of its brothels, and invoked a Congressional investigation upon it as an invasion of his Congressional privilege, such a man was a fit leader in this investigation, since he was the chosen associate of its vilest agents.

Mr. McLANE. I call for order.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order, and gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. PAGE. I hope order will be restored, and that members will take their seats.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey will suspend until order is restored. [After a pause]—

Mr. ROBESON. If there was a man on this floor who had brought his own brother from the inmost recesses of an inland State to enter as a contractor under a District government which he was daily denouncing as fraudulent and corrupt, such a man was a fit person to denounce and blackmail honest contractors. If there was a man who in the days of his pretended decency had sought and obtained through the head of a Department a provision for the support of a member of his family, which he still holds and enjoys through the favor of the Government and the bounty of the then Secretary of the Navy, such a man would be fitly qualified, by that malevolence which grows in mean natures from the enjoyment of undeserved favors, to strike at the character and reputation of the benefactor of his family. I name no man; I ask my friends to name no one; but I ask the gentlemen on the other side of the House to wake their recollections, to review their memories, and to say in their hearts if I have fitly characterized any man.

The result of such action and such leadership and direction I have not time fitly to describe; but I will read to the House for its information and for that of the country some extracts from the views of the minority of the committee charged with the investigation of the Navy Department, which, in mild but forcible terms, in moderate though strong language, fitly characterize it. Says that report:

> This investigation has extended over a period of six months, during the first four of which the Secretary of the Navy and the subordinates of the Department, the persons likely to be most affected by it, were carefully excluded from the committee-room, and the seal of secrecy was placed upon the lips of the members of the committee. Hundreds of witnesses were examined and discharged, not only in Washington but at the various navy-yards on the Atlantic coast; and when the committee had completed the testimony a mass of nearly three thousand pages was placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, and he was told that he might have the privilege of replying!
> The committee held no consultation whatever in relation to a report. The matter of a report was never talked of in the committee-room, and no one was authorized by the committee to prepare one, no sub-committee appointed, and no general discussion had as to what it should contain; but the members of the committee were notified to be present on the morning of the 18th instant in the committee-room to hear a report. When the committee was assembled the chairman produced a report and was proceeding to read it when a Republican member of the committee inquired of the chairman by what authority the report had been prepared, the matter never having been brought to the attention of the committee. To this question the chairman replied, "I recognized my political friends on the committee and have consulted them only," and proceeded to read the report.

During the reading of the report it became apparent that it had been already agreed to and passed upon by the majority of the committee. Its reading having consumed the entire day, the 18th, the Republican members of the committee on the next day proposed to take it up, subject by subject, and discuss and amend it. This proposition was voted down by a party vote in the committee, thus depriving the minority of any influence in determining the conclusions and character of the report of a committee of which they were members.

A report so made is likely to be but the reflex of the political sentiments of its authors, adapted to what they may deem the political necessities of their party.

It is, in fact, a partisan document, made on the eve of a great political contest, and is designed for political effect. While we will not hesitate to condemn and censure and demand punishment for any persons connected with the administration of naval affairs, from the highest officer to the lowest, for any act of fraud, corruption, or wanton neglect of duty, yet we cannot consent that false interpretations shall be put upon the lawful acts of the officers of the Navy Department, or that unjust censure shall fall upon those charged with the responsible, the important, exacting, and multifarious duties thereof.

The same party spirit which has manifested itself in the report dictated the policy of secrecy at the commencement of our labors, and closed the doors of the committee-room to anything like fair and impartial investigation. It is almost impossible to characterize in language of propriety the manner and spirit of the investigation itself, and it will be wholly impossible for the American mind to realize the fact that such oppressive wrongs have been carried on against our citizens in the American Capitol, under the protection of the Constitution and laws, and by a committee of Congress. The Constitution expressly provides that any person accused shall "be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation and be confronted with the witnesses against him." And yet day after day, for more than five months, witnesses were examined before this committee from every part of the country, heard with closed doors under the pledge of secrecy, and without notice to any person supposed to be affected by their testimony.

Every discharged employé, every disappointed contractor, every dissatisfied officer, who thought or imagined that his views or his interests had not been sufficiently considered; in short, every person who supposed or represented that he had cause of complaint, every bitter partisan who thought he could do injury to the Navy Department and the present Administration, every personal enemy who was disposed to attack its chief or any of its officers, was encouraged to appear and give his statement, not only of what he knew but what he had heard and what he imagined; everything that he thought might do injury, in secret session, without fear of intelligent cross-examination or opportunity for explanation of the real facts: and to facilitate all this the committee was divided up into subcommittees and sat in distant parts of the country, apparently that opportunity might be given for the retail of local gossip or the venting of petty personal malice. During all this time and until the Secretary of the Navy actually forced his way into the committee-room, by appeals to the committee which public opinion constrained them to regard, not only were the persons supposed to be affected kept in ignorance of the names of the witnesses and the subjects to which their testimony was directed, and even of the fact that such subjects were under investigation, but the members of the committee themselves, interested in eliciting the truth, while they were of course ignorant of most of the matters inquired into, were excluded by the injunction of secrecy even from seeking the sources of correct and proper information, and were thus debarred from developing the real facts, either by intelligent cross-examination or explanatory testimony.

Every protest against these proceedings was met with the reply that this was an examination into the system and manner of administration, to the end that appropriate legislation might be recommended, not an investigation of any person. But the manner of the investigation, the spirit in which it was carried on, the character of the witnesses, and the way in which their testimony has been used in the report of the majority, as well as the substance and spirit of the report itself, show that this investigation, so conducted, at an immense expense to the Government, was not, in fact, an investigation for the benefit of the service, but was mainly for the purpose of a partisan attack upon the Navy Department, its officers, and its head.

The report itself, as we have said, is in perfect consonance with the investigation, both in manner and spirit. Throughout its whole length facts and figures are perverted, and parties misrepresented. Everything is assumed against the Department and the Secretary, and nothing in their favor. Ad captandum statements and assumptions are given as facts, while the testimony which wholly refutes them is entirely ignored.

The speculations of single witnesses, who are supposed to establish some wrong or abuse, are quoted, while the sworn and legal testimony of the many which contradicts and destroys these speculations is never mentioned. The malignant givings-out of malicious enemies are assumed as true, while the testimony of honest witnesses is garbled and wrested from its intended meaning. Throughout the whole report every single thing which has occurred during the last seven years, with which the majority think they can find fault, is characterized as a great "abuse and fraud," and every exercise of legal authority about which they can find room for doubt or dissent is declared to be a violation of law. We propose to analyze, as far as may be, in the short time allowed us, the report of the majority, and the testimony upon which it is based, and in a general way to lay before Congress and the country what we believe to be the true and correct results of this long and laborious investigation.

* * * * * * *

It appears from the testimony of Captain Shufeldt, chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, (at page 676, miscellaneous proof,) that he visited on a tour of inspection in March last all the ships belonging to the North American squadron. When asked the condition of the Navy to-day as compared with what it was in 1869, he says:

"I think it is in a great deal better condition to-day than it was in 1869."

According to his statement the condition of the ships in 1869 and 1876, respectively, was as follows:

"In 1869 there were in good condition only twelve vessels, while in 1876 there are seventy vessels; in 1869 there were in that condition known as fair twenty-five vessels, while in 1876 there are only fourteen; in 1869 there were wanting important repairs twenty-four, in 1876 only sixteen; in 1869 there were wanting extensive repairs seventy-six, in 1876 only fifteen; there were in 1869 unfit for repairs fifty-eight vessels, and in 1876 there were only ten."

In the appendix to the miscellaneous proof, page 357, appear the detailed tables upon which Commodore Shufeldt founded his foregoing statement.

When Secretary Robeson took charge of the Navy there were two hundred and three vessels of all classes. It is asserted by the majority that the Navy has greatly diminished since, as if to intimate that the fault or error is justly attributed to the Secretary. Of these two hundred and three vessels there were condemned and sold, between January 1 and July 1, 1869, ten, as appears by the Register of July 1, 1869. From July 1, 1869, to the present time there have been condemned and sold thirty-eight, as appears by miscellaneous proof, page 604. There have been broken up, since July 1, 1869, ten, and there have been wrecked and lost at sea four, the Oneida, the Polaris, the Saginaw, and the Saranac, leaving of the navy of 1869 only one hundred and thirty-five vessels. To this number have been added eight sloops of war now nearly completed, two torpedo-boats, and two purchased vessels, the Dispatch and the Rio Bravo, showing the whole Navy as it now exists to be one hundred and forty-seven.

It is certainly not the fault of the present Secretary of the Navy that so many ships were, at the time of his advent to office, worthless and fit only to be sold; and who, if not Congress, is at fault if we have not a larger navy at the present time? The gentlemen of the majority of the committee condemn the Secretary for rebuilding old ships which would have otherwise long since been sold at auction or sent to the wrecking-yard. They condemn him for having purchased the Dispatch and the Rio Bravo. Had he acted as the report implies he should have acted, instead of one hundred and forty-seven vessels, most of which are now in good, serviceable condition, we should not have had over one hundred vessels. There have been repaired of the single-turreted iron-clads fifteen, which are now in good serviceable condition. Without repairs they would have been utterly worthless. Of the double-turreted monitors, five have been rebuilt, or are in process of being rebuilt, with iron frames.

* * * * * * *

It should also be understood that the Navy to the control of which he succeeded was largely composed of vessels built of bad materials during the war. Of these, many were already worthless; many others were fast going to decay and would soon become of no value. To merely patch up and repair such vessels so as to keep them afloat would be folly of the grossest kind and a waste of the public money; and a navy so maintained would have been a delusion and a snare. Take a vessel with a rotten white-oak frame, and how could it be repaired? To put in a new frame is what the majority call rebuilding and creating a new vessel. In rebuilding such a ship it would be folly to have an old and obsolete model, if a new and improved one were possible.

The Secretary, out of the annual appropriations, since 1869, has rebuilt under the name of repairs, if it is necessary to use that expression, the following vessels, and they are all far better ships now than they were before. Many of them are larger, on new models, and from sailing vessels some of them have been converted into steam-vessels of great speed.

The list includes the Amphitrite, Miantonomoh, Monadnock, Puritan, Terror, Quinnebaug, Swatara, Galena, Vandalia, Marion, Mohican, and Nipsic. We hold the conduct of the Secretary open to no objection. Congress appropriates from year to year a certain amount of money to be expended according to the judgment of the Navy Department in the construction and repair of vessels, and it would be absurd to hold that without special authority from Congress he could not substantially rebuild a vessel, if in doing so he could produce a better ship with less money than he could by repairing an old and worthless one. The committee complain of him for not keeping up the Navy, and yet would limit his power merely to the duty of repairing old and worthless vessels! We may well ask what sort of a navy we should now have had he acted upon any such construction of the law!

Again, we pronounce all these suggestions, inferences, and insinuations against the Secretary of the Navy to be wholly false and unfounded. They would be utterly unworthy and improper if there was no other proof in the case than that alluded to by the majority; but they know, though they are careful not to mention it, that there never was a more complete negative shown than has been proved by the Secretary in this case. Not only did he himself declare, and defy contradiction, that he never interfered as to the prices of purchases or the persons of whom they should be made, or as to the prices of contracts or the individuals who should receive them, but he was sustained on that point in the fullest manner by the testimony of every officer who is now or has been a chief of a bureau of the Navy Department since he has been in office, and every purchasing paymaster who has been on duty in New York, Philadelphia, or Washington at any time during that period—twenty-three gentlemen of the highest rank and established position, comprising almost every man who has made a contract or purchase of any kind for the Navy during the last six years, every one of them declared on his oath that the present Secretary of the Navy has never interfered in any way whatever in the making of their purchases or contracts; has never said one word about persons or prices, or ever ordered or dictated, or suggested or hinted at any favoritism to any one in regard to purchases or contracts. If anything could be more conclusive than this we are unable to conceive of it, for we are wholly unable to understand how an officer can be even suspected of fraud in contracts or purchases who, it is shown, never made or interfered with them in behalf of any one.

The report of the majority of the committee, while wholly ignoring this testimony, seeks to evade its force by suggesting that the Secretary has sometimes decided questions arising on contracts which were referred to him by chiefs of bureaus or by parties interested; that he has referred applications made to him to the proper bureaus, and that he has, in one or two instances during the last seven years, in signing for an absent chief of a bureau, put his signature in some formal way to an order. But these suggestions are utterly unworthy, and by their very feebleness show the irresistible force of the proof to which we have referred.

It is suggested by the majority that if the Secretary does not control the contracts in his Department he should do so, and that he should be held responsible for every fault that can be found in relation to them. This seems to us a strange misconception of the relations of the head of the Navy Department to the contracts and purchases for the naval service. No one would think of holding the Secretary of the Treasury responsible for the contracts and purchases made in relation to the public buildings which are erected under the authority of his Department, nor for any frauds or irregularities which might take place in the custom-houses or on the wharves of the various cities.

No one would think of holding the Secretary of War responsible for the contracts and purchases of the Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments of the Army, or for the contracts and work under the charge of the Chief of Engineers; yet the naval service is much more diversified in its nature and much more widely scattered in its operations than either of those above mentioned. The peculiar nature of the service requires more than any other the employment of experts in making contracts and purchase in every one of its branches. The law has provided for them in every bureau and has apportioned to them their various duties and responsibilities. The whole is, of course, under the general direction of the Secretary, who settles the general policy and gives general directions for carrying it out and who is generally responsible as an executive officer for the proper administration of his Department; but each chief of a naval bureau is a quartermaster-general in his own department, and the Chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing is the commissary-general of the Navy.

The purchasing-paymasters in the various cities, and with the fleets abroad, are the assistant quartermasters and commissaries of the service; and it would be as manifestly improper for the Secretary of the Navy to attempt to interfere with the details of contracts and purchases in the several bureaus as it would be for the Secretary of War to dictate contracts and prices to General Meigs or his subordinates, or to the Commissary-General or his assistants. The present Secretary of the Navy has so completely abstained from such interference that, even in cases where his confidence has been abused and his friendship betrayed, he is able to defy alike the aspersions of personal enemies and the persecutions of partisan spirit.

* * * * * * *

In view of this action on the part of the majority, and of our own settled conviction after a full examination of all the testimony, we recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That in this investigation no fraud, corruption, or willful violation of the law has been shown or appears to have been committed by Hon. GEORGE M. ROBESON while in the discharge of the duties of Secretary of the Navy; and we find no reason to censure or find fault with his conduct in the administration of the Navy Department.

That report was drawn by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] whose eloquent words you heard yesterday upon this floor, and the moderation and truth of whose character is known of all men here. It was signed by him and his associates, Mr. Danford, of Ohio, and Mr. Hays, of Alabama. I will not degrade him by comparison with the author of the majority report, but will cheerfully and confidently leave the commendation of him and his associates to weigh before Congress and the country against any and all of the malignant slanders of such a man as I have characterized and those who follow or imitate him. I will only add that the report of the member from Tennessee was, on examination, rejected by the Judiciary Committee of his own party.

I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that I have but little time left to review the presentation of these subjects made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] That presentation was specious, though it pretended to be candid; was extravagant, though it assumed to be careful; was false, though it claimed to be frank. Though it was evidently founded upon information gathered from the malevolence and misrepresentations of others, the gentleman who presented it gave it the stamp of his approval with all that reckless confidence which seems to be his nature when called upon to indorse anything which impugns the conduct or misrepresents the motives of others. But time will only permit me to answer him in general terms.

The gentleman from New York, while admitting in his speech that the ships I have spoken of had been built, criticised them in character, criticised them in results, and criticised them in speed, efficiency, and durability. I have no time left to go into many details in reply, but I will detain the House only to make some comparative statements which will absolutely refute the assertions of the gentleman.

I will show in reply that the ships which I built were better, faster, stronger, and more effective, ship for ship, than any of their class in the English or in any foreign navy. Speed in ships comes from great displacement and great size, with larger space for powerful machinery. All our ships are not of the greatest size. Ships for general cruising purposes should usually be small, since they take small complements of officers and men and are maintained and operated with greater economy. I would not therefore compare the 1,000-ton ships which I built with larger and more powerful vessels built abroad. I built such ships only as the laws of Congress authorized and their appropriations justified, and upon them I rest my case.

And, ship for ship and class for class, I claim that the ships I built were better than those of any other navy of the world. And I am ready here with the tables to compare them with their corresponding class for speed, economy, and endurance with those of England, the very ships which the gentleman from New York himself cited. Let us review, in the light of the record facts, his criticism of the Trenton in his comparison of her with the English ship Bacchante.

Without going into any mathematical calculations of the relative strength of the English iron ship and the United States wooden vessel, it is to be admitted that iron and steel are believed to-day to be better as ship-building materials than even live-oak. But the Trenton was built of the best material at the command of the Navy Department; she has proved herself the best ship that our Navy possesses, and equal in speed and economy to any foreign vessel she ever met in five years of cruising; and she has a hull and machinery to-day worthy of the best breech-loading guns that can be made.

Her speed on trial for eight continuous hours at sea, with full stores and coal and not specially fitted for a maximum trial, was over fourteen knots per hour, and she developed nearly thirty-five hundred horse-power at a cost of less than two pounds per horse-power, a performance in economy rarely reached by the best of compound machinery made here or abroad.

In his comparisons with this, Mr. HEWITT has given the maximum speed of the Bacchante, and on trial trip for a measured mile on the smooth water of the Thames, and compared it with the average hourly speed of the Trenton at sea.

The Trenton has a coal capacity to steam 2,800 miles at ten knots, equal in that respect to the vessel Mr. HEWITT quotes, which has a larger displacement by several hundred tons, and horse-power greatly in excess, as is herewith shown:

Trenton:
Length, (feet)	253
Draught, (feet)	19½
Tons	3,900
Horse-power	3,265
Speed, (knots)	14
Bacchante, (English:)
Length, (feet)	280
Draught, (feet)	22
Tons	4,310
Horse-power	5,250
Speed, (knots)	14.8

THE ADAMS AND RANGER CLASS.

Now, in regard to the vessels of the "Adams" and "Ranger" class built by the Navy Department, the gentleman from New York says, with truth, that the only way to arrive at their degree of efficiency is by comparison with foreign ships of the same character and class. But he is in error when, in making that comparison, he states that the highest rate of speed of our ships is about ten knots per hour, when the truth is that their logs show on trials that they have made as follows: Twelve and a half knots on trial trips for over six consecutive hours, and at a coal consumption of only 1.9 pounds per horse-power, and the engines indicated nearly 1,000 horse-power.

This speed, continuing for hours, exceeds that of the English vessels made for a few moments over a measured mile, and the cost per horse-power in coal is as economical as the best results obtained for foreign vessels, and they produce as large a power for their weight of machinery as any war vessels afloat.

The gentleman from New York again quotes the English vessels at their maximum for speed and coal on short trials, and cites the results of our own Navy at their cruising averages in varying conditions of service.

Comparing them with the English vessel, namely:

Adams class, (5 vessels:) Feet, 185; tons, 1,375; horse-power, 926; knots, 12½.

Pelican class, English, (14 vessels:) Feet, 170; tons, 1,224; horse-power, 1,060; knots, 11.

Alert class, (3 vessels:) Feet, 175; tons, 1,020; horse-power, 700; knots, 10½.

Albatross class, English, (6 vessels:) Feet, 160; tons 900; horse-power, 884; knots, 10.

Now, let us also compare the rebuilt ships of the Vandalia class with those of like class in the English Navy:

THE VANDALIA CLASS.

The comparison extended to this class of ships reconstructed during 1872 to 1876 is still more marked. One of the best vessels in the English navy is taken and official records in each case bear out this statement, namely:

Vandalia class, (5 vessels:) Length, 260 feet; tonnage, 2,400 tons; speed, 12¼ knots per hour, (cruising.)

Garnett class, English, (6 vessels:) Length, 220 feet; tonnage, 2,383 tons; speed, 13 knots per hour, (measured mile.)

THE DOUBLE-TURRETED MONITORS.

In regard to the double-turreted monitors, by this bill proposed to be finished, the gentleman from New York indulges in lengthy but imperfect criticism. Neither his statements nor his comparisons will stand the test of trial by the record.

DOUBLE-TURRETED IRON-CLADS.

Mr. HEWITT states that the proposed guns of the Miantonomoh are the heaviest that she can carry, namely, 20 tons each. This is a mistake; the design of the guns and the turrets are not yet determined; but the displacement of the Miantonomoh will permit guns of double that weight, and she can be fitted, if necessary, with steel-faced armor on her turrets. The guns of this ship should be and can be made equal to those of the Ajax, quoted in comparison with her, and the gun-makers of America are ready to-day to build them.

The gentleman further states that the Miantonomoh has only coal capacity to steam half-way across the Atlantic. This also is error. The Miantonomoh with 500 tons of coal on board can steam to any port on the Atlantic coast of Europe at an average speed of 10 knots per hour, while her full speed will reach 12 knots per hour.

In comparing the two vessels it must be considered that the Miantonomoh has 3,815 tons, with draught of water 14 feet, and the Ajax (English) 8,492 tons, with draught of water 23½ feet; so that the gentleman from New York is comparing the American iron-clad with an English one more than twice her size and weight and much greater draught of water, a draught which would make her almost useless on our shores or to attack our harbors.

The compound armor referred to by the gentleman as of such importance on the Ajax and Agamemnon (both of which are unfinished and untried British iron-clads) is identically the same as that proposed for the Miantonomoh turrets. He is certainly also misinformed on the subject of the contemplated thickness of the turrets of the Miantonomoh. The last board on that vessel recommended them to be 10¾ inches steel, and the surplus displacement of this vessel with all cruising weights on board will permit both side-armor and turrets to be increased in thickness.

The English Glatton has but one turret, while the Miantonomoh has two, with double the number of guns.

The gentleman states that no plans were prepared for these vessels, especially for the Puritan; but it is a fact capable of proof that her plans were all made and were verified by the Mullany inspecting board, and were found to correspond with the calculations upon which the bureau and builders' estimates were made regarding turrets, weights, &c.

It is further a fact that the bracket principle, double hull, &c., of these English ships and of the American Miantonomoh and her sister ships and of the Puritan are almost indentically the same.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York does not profess to be a ship-builder nor a naval expert, I suppose, any more than I do. He has, I suppose, taken his information from false sources; and as the information cannot rise above the source from which it is derived, he is thus led into these errors. The man from whom he takes his information, as I believe, is a man who was dismissed from the Navy Department before I went into it at the request of Admiral Porter, and as one of the first acts of General Grant's early administration——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. At this point permit me. The only source of information which I have had was the reply of the Navy Department to my resolution. I wish to disabuse the mind of the gentleman from New Jersey of what he now says. I have had no information whatever of any kind from the person of whom he speaks, nor any communication with him directly or indirectly, nor can I even conjecture the name of the person to whom he refers.

Mr. ROBESON. How can the gentleman deny that he "has had any communication" from the person of whom I speak, if he is not able to conjecture his name?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I say that I have had no information except through the Navy Department; and that I have not had any communication from anybody who has been dismissed from the Navy. I do not know to whom the gentleman refers.

Mr. ROBESON. I recognize, I am sure, a similarity not only of statement but of expression, line for line, point for point, and measure for measure, in some reports and utterances of Chief Engineer Isherwood and in the statement of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman from New Jersey will name the gentleman to whom he refers——

Mr. ROBESON. I refer to Chief Engineer Isherwood, for the last ten years the Democratic expert in these attacks on the Navy Department.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have had no communication, direct or indirect, with Chief Engineer Isherwood in any form, shape, or manner.

Mr. ROBESON. I must then give the gentleman the full benefit of his denial; and I say to him that he has at least fallen into this error in comparing the speed of ships without the aid of an expert, namely, that he has taken the speed of the English ships over the measured mile on the Thames upon their trial trips, and has compared that with the daily log of our ships cruising on the ocean.

The gentleman from New York has also undertaken to question the quality and durability of the ships I built by quoting the estimated cost of the needed repairs. I need not remind him, however, that I am neither responsible for not keeping them in repair after I left the Department nor for any sums large or small which it may now be proposed to spend upon them. They were built, however, of the best material at the command of the Department, the best then used in the world, and they have the ordinary life-time and durability of the best ships of their class and material. And I will inform the gentleman of one other fact, perhaps unknown to him, but with which my experience in the Department has made me familiar—the fact, that the useful life of a wooden sea-going steamship is not over eight or nine years, that at the end of that period she requires expensive repairs, and after that, unless she is wholly or almost wholly rebuilt, you had better lay her up than waste much money upon her repairs. I will say also, what the gentleman ought to know, that the life of the boilers of the sea-going ship is not more than seven years; that at the expiration of such period these boilers must be renewed or most expensively repaired. This is a complete answer to the criticisms of the gentleman upon the durability of these ships, (many of them built ten or twelve years ago,) which the gentleman prints in his speech as an attack upon their quality and their endurance. They were built of American live-oak, the best material that was then afforded for our ships; and they remain to-day valuable ships ready to be compared favorably with any of their material and class in the world.

I will append to these remarks a short table comparing the most efficient cruising ships which remain in our Navy with those which approach nearest them in size and class in the English navy; so that gentlemen may see once for all how our Navy, as far as it goes, compares in quality and efficiency with the ships of England.

In addition to the ships of which I have spoken, I had also left me as a legacy of the war fourteen single-turreted iron-clads of the monitor class like the original monitor which beat the Merrimac in Hampton Roads. Those I also throughly rebuilt with iron beams and frames of iron, so that though slow ships, not effective to go away from our own shores, they add greatly to the strength of our Navy for the defensive purposes of a peaceful nation.

All this work was done out of the ordinary current appropriations of the Navy, with the exception of $3,200,000 appropriated for the eight steam sloops of war: and the Trenton, which the gentleman so severely criticises, to-day stands before the world as the proudest monument of American ship-building—the equal and superior of every ship of her character and class that she has met in cruising round the world for the last six years, till the Broad Arrow, published in London, has in editorial remarks called the attention of the British admiralty to her achievements and to her success. Again I say that class for class, ship for ship, power for power, material for material, the ships that I was enabled to build out of the meager appropriations for the Navy will stand as well in comparison as any others of that date in the world.

And now by this bill, Mr. Speaker, we are proposing to build new ships of a superior class, according to modern ideas, and with improved material, machinery, and armament. We are trying to do it without laying unnecessary burdens upon the people. We are trying to save on the luxuries what we seek to spend on the necessities of the service. We here cut down the expenses in the navy-yards, where the record shows it takes two dollars to spend one. We have curtailed the civil list, already far too large for the work required. We have reduced the superfluous roster of an overgrown service, seeking to bring them face to face with the real condition of things, that they may see the necessity not only of submitting to but of themselves inaugurating, reforms. We have sought also to bring back harmony and good feeling to the service, and to give a healthy and consistent action to the whole organization, by bringing all its representative officers out through the same process of education and graduation, launching them in the service on an equal plane of honorable duty and efficiency, and giving, as far as rules and laws may accomplish it, superior respect to superior merit alone. [Here the hammer fell.] My time is exhausted, Mr. Speaker, and I would only say in closing that what I have done in the past and what I am now striving to do I believe to be for the best interests of the Navy and of the Government which maintains it. My opinion may be antagonized and my efforts frustrated, but I shall have at least the approval of my own conscience. In conclusion I recall the words of the great cardinal:

> Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
> Thy God's, and truth's; then if thou fall'st, * * *,
> Thou fall'st, a blessed martyr.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired. The question on the passage of the bill must, under the rules——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] be extended. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] Oh, yes! Why not?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the yeas and nays must be taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to suspend the rules by which the yeas and nays are ordered, so as to allow the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. HOOKER. Why not? I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee addressed the Chair, but has no time allowed for debate. The question is upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that the Chair should listen to the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other member who states that he rises to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. No member, so far as the Chair understood, has risen and made that statement. The gentleman from Tennessee sought to proceed with the debate; and the Chair does not understand that the vote on the passage of the bill may be interrupted in that way.

Mr. RANDALL. I so understood the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSE. I heard him distinctly, that he rose to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. Just now?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAZELTON. Not when he first got up.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman first rose he did not make that statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not think I could be wrong.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The gentleman can have his time.

Mr. RANDALL. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. He can have his time at the proper time.

Mr. CURTIN. Is there general leave to print?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand there is.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask leave to print my remarks.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. [See Appendix.]

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 76, not voting 95; as follows:

Mr. MCLANE with Mr. URNER.

Mr. HAZELTON with Mr. COX, of New York. If Mr. COX were present, Mr. HAZELTON would vote "yea."

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague, Mr. STOCKSLAGER, has been called home by sickness, and if present he would vote "no."

Mr. VAN HORN. My colleague, Mr. RICE, is absent on account of sickness.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. ROBESON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments upon a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker, a short time since the member from New Jersey, having charge of the naval appropriation bill, and being entitled under the rules of the House to the hour given by those rules to the conclusion of the argument and disposition of that bill, availed himself of the privilege thus secured in explaining and enforcing the reasons why the bill should be passed to go entirely out of his way to make a hypothetical assault upon some one. At the time he made it, and in alluding to the school fund of a State, I had no question in my mind that I was the person referred to, for the reason that prior to the discussion upon this bill I had information that that member, following the instincts which governed him when he was Secretary of the Navy, as I infer, was getting up information personal to myself in connection with the school fund of the State of Tennessee. Either emissaries or friends were engaged in this work; hence immediately upon reference being made to it I made a personal application, and I now very coolly and quietly state to you, and through you to the House and to the country, that with the school fund of the State of Tennessee I never had any connection directly or indirectly whatever. It is true in the past political history of our State some reference had been made to the connection of Governor (now Senator) Harris with that fund; but the remotest connection I had with it was the fact that I was adjutant-general under him. Now, again, having thus temporarily disposed of the matter, so far as I am concerned, I believe it to be due to Governor Harris, having mentioned his name to-day, that any intimation that he had any improper connection with it is entirely untrue and unwarranted.

Now, sir, I pass to another matter. It suited that member to say during this discussion that upon my advice and counsel a brother of mine came to the city of Washington and obtained a contract from an administration which I had continually and persistently denounced. Allow me to say right here with equal coolness, calmness, and deliberation, that that is not the truth. I had a brother who obtained a contract under the present administration of the District of Columbia for a short time only. The truth of the matter is, I advised him against coming here, and advised him to sever that connection as soon as possible.

Again, I understood the member from New Jersey to intimate to-day that I had legislated a son of mine into office in some connection. That is not the truth.

Now, sir, another reference was made by him, that I had incited an investigation of the police in which my personal conduct and habits were involved. I did not induce that investigation, but the member has referred to it, and I stand here to repeat now to this country and in the face of that member that, when charged by the rules of this House—when charged by them—and in the discharge of my duty to the country to investigate the condition of the Navy Department, I undertook that work, and labored without fear, favor, or affection. I went deliberately, diligently, laboriously, and industriously into that work. I did what I conceived to be my entire duty in connection with it. A short time after I had commenced the work I was made aware of the remarkable fact that there were detectives from the Navy Department watching me day and night in the performance of my work and at other times. Who authorized them? By what authority they were to surround me to shadow my actions and observe my movements I did not know and I do not know now. But, sir, at the close of that investigation, and when it became my duty to make a report upon it, a colleague of mine, who is now here upon this floor and within hearing of my voice, came to me and said that there had been detectives upon my track to inquire into my moral habits and conduct, and that he had received information from a very reliable source that, in the opinion of the men who were conducting that investigation, they had me.

That colleague requested as a personal favor that I would not ask the name of the gentleman who had come to him and given the information. I replied to him—and it was General ATKINS, my friend, and I know of no man with whom I would more willingly intrust my honor and reputation—that I accepted such a pledge, and would not seek from him the name of his informant. He thereupon proceeded to tell me what they said they had against me. I characterized the allegations then as utterly false and without a shadow of foundation, and told my colleague that I believed it was a scheme devised for the purpose of black-mailing me, and an attempt to deter me from the performance of my duty to the House and to the country. I also told him to go back to the responsible man from whom the information came and say to him that if hell yawned three feet in advance of me, I would go on and do my duty regardless of consequences. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not know the full extent of this nefarious work. I did not know, nor do I now, who was engaged in it. But, sir, there appeared before that investigation the member from the State of New Jersey, and in his testimony, upon oath taken before that committee, he said that he had communicated this fact as a friend to Mr. HALE with a view that Mr. HALE might communicate it to some friend of mine, and that he knew nothing of it. Why, sir, in the face of all the responsibility that belongs to me I believe that when that member swore that he swore a lie. I believe that, sir; I do not know it. If I did know it I would have another recourse, or would have taken it then; that is to say, I would have consulted the gentleman personally, not offensively, of course.

For my personal conduct or my official conduct I am at all times ready to answer. But, sir, that member, as an excuse for this, has said that the investigation conducted by myself was a secret one. Does not that member know that long before that investigation was closed by order of the committee the testimony was handed over to him for his inspection, and ample opportunity given him for cross-examination? That was the fact.

Again, the gentleman says—I beg pardon; the member says—that in that investigation his private affairs were touched upon, that his mother's dower and his wife's private property were asked for. I tell him again that he there sticks in the bark with the view of uttering that which is not true.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I believe——

Mr. ROBESON. I hope my friend from New York will let him go on. Let the galled jade wince.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The galled jade has winced.

Mr. MILLER. Who is wincing now?

Mr. CANNON. Who is the galled jade?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am entirely willing that this explanation should go as far as the limits of propriety will allow, but I believe it is entirely out of order to indulge in charges against a member on this floor of the character that have been made by the gentleman from Tennessee. I ask that the words be taken down.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, take them down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] asks that the words of the gentleman from Tennessee be taken down.

Mr. HISCOCK. At the instance of the gentleman from New Jersey, I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws his demand that the words be taken down. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In the course of the investigation referred to, because it was deemed proper—I will not say by the committee, although I never proceeded without the assent of a majority of the committee, but I take the responsibility myself—in the course of the investigation there was developed the relation of the Secretary of the Navy with the firm of A. G. Cattell & Co. and with one Simeon M. Johnson. By the proof in the case of Hungerford, it was shown that Simeon M. Johnson had divided a fee with some one, and as I looked at the proof I was satisfied there were but two parties connected with that case. Those were the Secretary of the Navy and Simeon Johnson, and Simeon Johnson paid some one a large sum of money.

Again, the most intimate relations were shown to exist between the firm of A. G. Cattell & Co. and the Secretary of the Navy; Cattell & Co. being engaged in real estate operations in the District of Columbia and in the city of Long Branch. It was shown by the proof that over $300,000 had been collected by the firm of A. G. Cattell & Co. for the sale of naval influence. Now, it occurred to me as a little singular that a Secretary of the Navy who, according to the proof, had no money, but was a poor barrister at law—that that man should be handling as much property and investing as largely as he was without some other source of revenue than the legitimate salary he was receiving. And the proof showing that Cattell & Co. had sold naval influence, that they were his friends prior to his becoming Secretary and were his partners while he was Secretary, it occurred to me that on a proper investigation of the facts it could be shown this money received by Simeon Johnson and the money received by the Cattells was a swag to be divided between that Secretary of the Navy and these parties. I believed it then; I believe it now; and believing that, I believed I had a right to resort, and as I think, a majority of the committee had a right to resort, to the method which was adopted to demonstrate it.

I again say, and I say it now here in the face of the country, that when I approached the domain of the domestic family there I paused, leaving it for that Secretary of the Navy in his explanation to go further if he saw proper. And I say now, if he had opened the door himself, which he would not or dared not do, or refrained from doing—if he had opened the door himself it would have been established to the satisfaction of the country that the firm of A. G. Cattell & Co. ramified itself all through the Navy Department. When A. G. Cattell, the ex-Senator, swore he was a partner——

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the Chair whether the personal privilege attaching to this explanation has not now been exhausted. I am very anxious to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has frequently held, following the precedents, that the personal privilege must be confined to the particular thing that the gentleman regards himself aggrieved about. It never extends the right to a member, who avails himself of the rule to raise a question of personal privilege, to make an attack upon any one else any further than is essential to an answer to the particular charge against himself.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is alluding to the testimony.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair will hold, if the point is made——

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point——

The SPEAKER. That the gentleman is out of order if he proceeds to make an attack on any person foreign to the answer which he desires to make.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I respectfully submit to the Speaker that when the member from New Jersey alleged that without cause and without propriety there was an investigation of his private affairs, the statement of the facts which in my judgment made that investigation necessary is proper to be heard by the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule as it has heretofore been enforced.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the privilege [of making personal explanation] is given, the member must confine his remarks to the matter upon which he has been criticised, and in regard to which he has asked consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that the gentleman from New Jersey himself spoke of this whole subject of the investigation, and that the gentleman from Tennessee naturally and properly has the right to refer to anything that is in the testimony gathered in that investigation——

Mr. HISCOCK. This whole subject has been under discussion——

Mr. RANDALL. And the charges that were made by the gentleman from New Jersey against the gentleman from Tennessee in connection therewith.

Mr. HISCOCK. This whole subject has been under discussion upon a previous day. The gentleman from Tennessee has had his day before the House; has had two hours nearly, in which the career of the gentleman from New Jersey was criticised and reviewed. Not one-tenth of the time taken by the gentleman from Tennessee in reviewing that career has been taken by the gentleman from New Jersey in answering the charges that were brought against him. Now, I insist that this speech which the gentleman from Tennessee is now making is simply a duplication, a going over substantially, not entirely, but to some extent, of the same grounds which he has before been over. I insist that it is a mere matter of argument, a mere matter of discussion; and the discussion upon this bill has been closed, for the bill has been passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say that I deprecate as much as any gentleman can the unpleasant personal features that this discussion has assumed. But I desire that the Chair shall consider this: the gentleman from New Jersey complained of an investigation to which he had been subjected in a former Congress. In the course of that complaint, as he stated it to the House, it became necessary, in the judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee, for him to rise to a personal explanation.

Now, by way of vindicating his official action as the chairman of the committee that conducted that investigation, I insist that the well-known sense of fairness by which the Chair is actuated will not allow him to preclude the gentleman from Tennessee from referring to matters that are of record in the testimony, in the proof, in order to show whether the complaint of the gentleman from New Jersey as to the institution of that investigation was well founded or not. As I understand it, the gentleman from Tennessee up to this time has not traveled outside of the line of the proof taken by that committee in its investigation.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is a fair man. I ask him now to indicate how much time the gentleman from Tennessee ought to have, so that we may allow him to go into the subject as much as he pleases, and how much time the gentleman from New Jersey should have in reply——

Mr. ROBESON. I do not want any.

Mr. HISCOCK. So that we may get to the end of the matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am obliged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] for that inquiry, for it enables me to add what I should have said before. It seems to me that not only does the gentleman from New Jersey arraign the gentleman from Tennessee for the institution of that investigation but he arraigns at this time a former Congress for authorizing and for conducting it.

I think the gentleman from Tennessee should have ample time to vindicate, as far as the proof and the testimony may enable him to do so, not only his own action in that regard but that of the Congress which authorized the investigation. And I shall be among the last, I shall be the very last, that will put a gag in the mouth of the gentleman from New Jersey if he desires to reply.

Mr. HISCOCK. I fear it will take until the 1st of August if all the time necessary for that purpose shall be given to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only feels called upon to enforce the rule. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee must confine his remarks wholly to the statement he chooses to make in answer to the remarks which he feels aggrieved about. In other words, he must confine his remarks to an answer to the criticism that he claims was made upon him personally. In this the Chair simply follows the universal practice. The gentleman from Tennessee will confine his remarks to an answer to the remarks in which he feels he was criticised wrongfully.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, I cheerfully submit, though I or my party may suffer, to the decision of the Chair, and I know what that estoppel means. Possibly I would have been led on to a fuller explanation if permitted. But, sir, protesting that in all this investigation in the past I have been animated only by a sense of my official duty as the organ of the House of Representatives; knowing all the difficulties that lay in my way; knowing all the means that were resorted to to thwart that investigation; knowing that I had to combat the influence of the Department and the wealth that surrounded it; knowing that I had to encounter falsehood and perjury at every step; knowing that I risked that which man holds more dear than life itself, I have without fear gone along in the discharge of that duty. But now, sir, after having done that duty, when accused of improper motives or improper conduct, I stand in the face of the country and with all the responsibilities that belong to me attach to the forehead of that member falsehood and perjury. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, since the member from Tennessee has accepted by acknowledgment the application of all that I said to himself, though I did not so apply it, I am willing to rest before Congress and the country without reply to any suggestion of a man who recognizes himself in the portrait which I drew. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Speaker rapped to order.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 62) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Terre Haute, Indiana;

A bill (S. No. 750) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana;

A bill (S. No. 1045) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Crow Indians, for the sale of a portion of their reservation in the Territory of Montana, required for the use of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; and

A bill (S. No. 1875) for the erection of a public building at Harrisonburgh and Abingdon, State of Virginia.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SINKING FUND.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means the bill (S. No. 2090) to further regulate the investment of the Pacific Railroad sinking fund.

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Ways and Means has nothing to do with that question.

Mr. KELLEY. There is a million of dollars needing investment.

Mr. ANDERSON. All right. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

REPORTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION AND NATIONAL MUSEUM.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. The committee has directed me to report back without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 144) authorizing the Public Printer to print reports of the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he hereby is, instructed to print and stereotype, from time to time, the regular number of 1,900 copies of any matter furnished him by the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution relative to the operations, researches, and explorations of the Institution and the National Museum, to be capable of being distributed in parts, and the whole to form annual volumes in quarto or octavo, as may be required, with suitable illustrations, to be made under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing; the extra edition of said works to consist of 5,000 copies, of which 2,500 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, for distribution to public libraries and for exchange, the returns for which to be placed in the Library of Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman reporting this proposition will tell us the probable cost of this printing.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will; I have the figures here.

Mr. RANDALL. One of the greatest abuses connected with the Government is this unlimited printing, which is not only done under the action of Congress itself, but which permeates every department of the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have here an estimate of the cost of printing these reports for several years past.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is this matter privileged over an appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Printing has the right to report at any time and to have its reports considered.

Mr. HISCOCK. I call up the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the report from the Committee on Printing is in order now.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I raise the question of consideration upon this report.

Mr. SPRINGER. This matter can be settled sooner than the question of consideration can be disposed of. I desire to state to the House——

Mr. RANDALL. The question of consideration is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] raises the question of consideration against this report. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution which has been read?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no desire to press this matter against the wish of the House; I withdraw the report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds having voted therefor.

LUCRETIA R. GARFIELD.

Mr. TAYLOR. I had intended to call up at this time House bill No. 5889, for the relief of Lucretia R. Garfield. It is, however, impossible perhaps for me to engage the attention of the House at this time in antagonism with an appropriation bill. For another reason also, from the fact that the Senate has already acted upon the main part of this bill and the subject will be before us in another way, when discussion will be as general as upon the bill, I do not feel called upon to press the bill now except in one particular. The first section of this bill, relating merely to the salary of the President for the year, I should like to have the consent of the House to pass at this time as a separate proposition.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman drafted what he desires?

Mr. TAYLOR. I have. I desire to say, inasmuch as some comment has been made on it at the other end of the Capitol, that at all times since this report has been made that committee and myself have been anxious to have the matter considered, but other questions have arisen and their consideration has prevented it, sometimes one and sometimes another. I am willing now to let the subject be acted on in the appropriation bill and to let the House dispose of it there, with the exception of this first section, relating merely to the salary of the President for the year.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to present a bill for consideration, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill for the relief of Lucretia R. Garfield.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Lucretia R. Garfield, widow of James A. Garfield, late President of the United States, or in the event of her death before payment, then to the legal representatives of said James A. Garfield, the sum of $50,000, less any sum paid to James A. Garfield or to his widow on account of salary as President of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. Where does this come from?

Mr. McMILLIN. Has this been referred to any committee?

The SPEAKER. It is a portion of a bill already reported.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection to its being introduced and referred.

Mr. TAYLOR. It has been reported by the committee, and this is literally a transcript of a portion of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio not to subdivide the report of the committee, of which he is chairman, but to call it all up for action by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let it be referred.

The SPEAKER. It is a portion of a bill already reported to the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the gentleman to call up the whole report.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have already stated to the House why I am not disposed at this time to call up the whole report for consideration. In the first place, I am not disposed to antagonize the appropriation bill, inasmuch as the Senate has acted on the remaining portion of the report of the committee and attached it to that bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In reply I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate had no jurisdiction of that matter, and its action is not preclusive on this House. On the 19th of April the gentleman from Ohio filed a majority report, a portion of which he now culls in the shape of this bill. He gave notice, as the RECORD shows, it would be his pleasure to call that report up at an early day. That was, if I remember, on the 19th of April. From then until now, as a member of the committee filing a minority report, I have pressed and pleaded with the gentleman from Ohio to call it up for consideration. I want it now, and I want it all here before this House, and I do not want this House to be precluded by any flank movement that a sub-Committee on Appropriations of the Senate may have attempted.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. May I say one word by consent of the House in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky? At the time this bill was reported I gave notice of my intention to call it up for the consideration of the House at an early day. I then intended of course to do it. I have intended ever since to do it. I remember, and I have not had my attention called to that particularly, that the gentleman from Kentucky did once, I think, and only once, call attention to bringing the bill before the House.

Among other considerations why there has been delay was this: I said at that time to the gentleman from Kentucky I would only call this bill up in his presence. There was one time that it might have been called up when he was absent, and that was the time when he was absent on the order of the House, and I said to him before he went I would keep my word and would not call it up at that time. When he returned from that visit to West Point he subsequently came to me and said he was desirous of being absent for a while, and then he wished the bill to come up. It would have come immediately before this bill. I said I would do so. I intended to do so, but I found I could not successfully. That is all. I had no idea of not calling it up except this reason, developed without my knowledge, and which I supposed would be satisfactory to everybody.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the bill which is before the House.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in committee, and the question under consideration is the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes. The bill will be read a first time for information.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I move the committee rise for the purpose of limiting general debate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, what limit he proposes to put upon the debate; for certainly he does not intend to refuse ample opportunity for those of us who may want to be heard on this subject, and on all matters either cognate or irrelevant to the matter which he has reported?

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, it has not been the policy of this side of the House to refuse to the other side all legitimate discussion, and we shall not do it now.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then, what time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. HISCOCK. It would seem proper that the suggestion as to time should come from the other side. How much time do you want?

Mr. RANDALL. Let the debate run a while.

Mr. SPRINGER. That can be settled if the debate has been allowed to proceed.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is the way you used to try to run us.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to say this to the committee: it is very desirable that this bill should be got at the earliest practicable moment over to the Senate. We are working, at least the Committee on Appropriations is working, to get an adjournment on the 17th, and therefore it is that I may be pardoned if I insist upon limiting this debate to some reasonable time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust I may be permitted to suggest, as a minority member of the sub-committee that has been charged with the preparation of this bill, that it was no more my purpose to make a speech upon the bill than it seems to have been the purpose of the gentleman from New York, who has not touched it. I did not believe I wanted to be heard more than the time that would have been accorded to me under the operation of the five-minute rule. But I did not know what a wide scope the debate was likely to take upon a sundry civil bill. Now, I am satisfied after hearing what the gentleman has said that I shall want to be heard for an hour in response to the campaign speech which the gentleman has made. Again, if the gentleman had been desirous of having the appropriation bills passed there was no reason why the sundry civil bill should not have been reported to the House five weeks ago, for it was ready at that time.

Mr. HISCOCK. I agree to it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, the gentleman from New York, with that candor for which he is justly proverbial at all times, has all of this time admitted that it was to be held back until the contested elections were disposed of.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have never admitted it——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman promised me to make that statement on the floor of the House, and it was made in open committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. And I desire here to make the same statement that I made to the gentleman, and which I made to other gentlemen, that the appropriation bills would not be pressed in this House to the exclusion of legitimate and proper business which should come before the House for consideration. I said I would not press the bills here to the exclusion of the consideration of the election cases.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Any question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that it is now within one minute of the expiration of his hour.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Unless the Chair interposes, the gentleman has already yielded.

Mr. HISCOCK. All I can say in reference to the question of the gentleman is what has been stated already, that these bills should not be pressed to the exclusion of the consideration of the public business. That is entirely correct.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did not the gentleman from New York say in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, and in open committee, that if the question was pressed upon him on the floor of the House he would answer to the House in candor that these bills would not be presented—not pressed for consideration, but not presented—until such contested-election cases were disposed of as the Committee on Elections had in hand?

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman asked that question as if he was launching at me something that I am unwilling to respond to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. You seem loath to give the answer.

Mr. HISCOCK. I answer the gentleman without hesitation that I did so state.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is it.

Mr. HISCOCK. That I did so state, and, sir, instead of my blushing for it now, or admitting that it was wrenched from me as from a witness on the stand, I calmly proclaimed that such was my purpose, and have never hesitated to avow it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This is not the first time the gentleman has gloried in that which was not creditable.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist upon his motion?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Regular order.

Mr. BAYNE. I simply want to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. BAYNE. For this purpose: I desire to say that it would be well enough to let the general debate run a little while before attempting to fix a limit.

Mr. BLACKBURN. You cannot close it; you have no quorum.

Mr. BAYNE. Let this debate run for a while, and then it will be time enough to fix a limit to the general debate; and I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his motion that the committee do now rise that debate may go on this evening.

Mr. HISCOCK. I cannot withdraw it. I am entirely willing to agree with gentlemen on the other side on any fair limit to this debate, and when we get into the House we will then and there agree upon it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We will rather defeat your motion. You will have no quorum in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 64, noes 55.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers.

Mr. HISCOCK. When the committee has risen we can agree upon a fair length of time to be allowed for debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. What was the vote?

The CHAIRMAN. There were, ayes 64, noes 55.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my demand for tellers.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the sundry civil appropriation bill; and pending that I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to three hours.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Say six hours.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then we will have a vote. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the gentleman from New York shall agree to let general debate run till two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York, before this motion shall be put, to the fact that he has occupied one hour in general debate and he still holds his rights unimpaired under the rule in the matter of conclusion.

Mr. HISCOCK. Of that hour I will agree to yield one-half to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is not fair. The gentleman from New York has already had his hour. Let us see what the result would be as to the division of time between the supporters of the bill and its opponents.

Mr. HISCOCK. I say let the time for general debate be limited now to three hours; and if gentlemen on the other side of the House at the expiration of that time seem to feel or think they require more time, I myself will make the motion that the committee rise, so that the time may be extended.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me make this suggestion to the gentleman from New York: he has had one hour, and if he fixes a limit now of three hours, that will give to the opponents of the bill the pittance of one hour and a half, while the other side will have had two and a half hours, the gentleman having his rights in addition in the matter of conclusion. That surely is not a fair division. I suggest then to the gentleman from New York that general debate shall run till to-morrow at three o'clock.

Mr. HISCOCK. We are to have a session this evening, and certainly that evening session can be well devoted to debate. Or I am entirely willing to devote it to the consideration of this bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from New York so that general debate on this bill shall terminate at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to make the time three o'clock; and my amendment as fixing the longest time, takes precedence.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he takes into consideration the fact that we have a standing order for an evening session to-night? Does he intend that general debate on this bill shall continue this evening?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I intend this debate shall go on until such time as the committee see fit to rise and the House to adjourn. Let the evening session, if you want one, be for debate only; but my proposition is that the general debate on this bill shall close at three o'clock to-morrow, and that we shall then proceed to consider it under the five-minute rule by paragraphs for amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make an appeal to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK.] I will remind him that during the last Congress, as he will remember, oftentimes when similar questions came up, his side of the House took the position that they did not want the debate limited at the beginning. They had the power to compel this side of the House to comply with their wishes. Frequently we took issue with them, but at last we were compelled to yield. We are in the same position now. We have gone on smoothly thus far this session; and I ask the gentleman to agree to let the debate run to a reasonable time.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will accept the proposition to let the debate run till two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Two o'clock will do.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let it be understood that one-half the time shall be given to this side, to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. That can be settled by arrangement with the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] modifies his motion so that general debate on the bill shall close at two o'clock to-morrow.

The motion as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. KASSON in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. By order of the House all general debate on the bill will be closed at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I intend, at least in a degree, to follow the example of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and not undertake to inflict upon this Committee of the Whole a speech upon this bill. But I do not intend to follow his very questionable example in delivering a campaign speech upon every subject in the world except the measure depending here for determination.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is the gentleman addressing me?

Mr. BLACKBURN. "The gentleman" is addressing the Chair, as he is required to do under the rule. I do not know that there is anything involved in this bill which the members of the sub-committee charged with its preparation cannot fully and fairly and elaborately discuss under the operation of the five-minute rule; at least such was my purpose and such is yet my intention.

This bill carries between twenty-three and twenty-four millions of money. I intend to be entirely fair and perfectly frank. I admit that as a rule, in the main, I am satisfied that this bill, whether wisely drafted or not, has been carefully considered and carefully prepared. It has been in course and process of preparation for more than three months, during the greater portion of which time the attention of the sub-committee charged with its construction has been given to it at night as well as during the day.

There are provisions in the bill which I shall oppose. As we reach them I will ask the indulgence of the House, not to argue them, but simply to state the objections that I hold to them.

In the main I believe that the bill is at least a fair bill. It is a liberal bill, liberal in its close approximation to the estimates submitted by the Departments for appropriations; liberal in the consideration that has been given to every question which has been presented to that sub-committee, with a view to its incorporation in this bill. I desire to do more and to go further; and to bear testimony to the zeal and the energy and the perfect sincerity that has characterized the action of my confrères on that sub-committee. I have not, from the beginning to the end of their labors, discovered a single instance in which fair dealing was not conspicuous and a full and fair consideration accorded to every interest and to every member who appeared there with any claim or demand upon its consideration.

But while that is true, there are features in this bill that seem to me to be too liberal, to be verging very close upon ground that would subject them to criticism upon the score of prodigality. I am not to be deterred from the expression of this protest, as we shall reach the various paragraphs of the bill, by reason of the parade of deficiencies which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has thrust upon the attention of the House.

There are but few of us who have not some general acquaintance with the history of deficiencies in appropriation bills of Congress. There are none of us but know that deficiencies are the products of recent years. Prior to the conclusion of the war deficiencies constituted the exception, and not the rule, as they have stood for the last seventeen years.

The gentleman from New York need not undertake in his political harangue, which doubtless was intended rather to aid a campaign committee than to throw light upon the sundry civil appropriation bill—he need not undertake to make the Democratic party responsible for the deficiencies that have occurred during the last six years.

He knows as well as I that from the day his party came into power in the American Congress down to this time deficiencies have been the rule every year in every bill for every department of this Government. He knows more. He knows that, notwithstanding the increase of the appropriations which this Congress is passing and making into law, as certain as the ides of next December shall come, he, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will come back to the second session of this Congress and demand deficiency appropriations for every department of this Government.

He need not undertake to explain away the increase of appropriations for the current fiscal year upon the ground of the parsimony displayed by the Democratic party, lately in power in this House, in the matter of pensions. He knows, as well as he knows anything, that as a member of the Committee on Appropriations in the Forty-sixth Congress he sat there and saw us call the then Commissioner of Pensions before us and take his estimates, accept his calculations, and vote to him every dollar that he said his bureau needed.

And if deficiencies came in that bureau they arose, not because the then existing Congress refused to grant the estimates he made for appropriations, but they arose simply because the head of that bureau himself blundered. Whatever crimes the Republicans may charge to the account of Democratic Congresses, they cannot truthfully upon the records say that they ever refused every dollar that the Pension Commissioner asked.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have been subjected to a cross-examination which I rather courted by the gentleman from Kentucky in reference to what occurred in the committee-room.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman will do me the justice, however, to admit that that was never referred to except when the gentleman himself stated in the committee-room that he would repeat that statement in the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman will pardon me if I ask him if he was in favor of the increase of clerks for the Pension Bureau?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman would have gotten his answer without his question if he could only have curbed his natural impatience. If he would be more patient when other men are on the floor he would sometimes be answered without the necessity of interrupting them. I was coming to that.

I was coming, Mr. Chairman, to that very feature of the gentleman's harangue, though I was doing it in my own way and in my own good time. But the answer shall be full enough to meet his demands.

The gentleman has told us of the necessity for this unusual procedure, that the great omnibus appropriation bill of Congress, the reservoir into which everything in the shape of an appropriation that does not belong specifically anywhere else is dumped—the sundry civil appropriation bill is here to-day past meridian, on the 6th day of July, the sixth day of a current fiscal year, for the first time shown in print either to the House or to the country. The gentleman has sought to explain this upon the ground that the majority party of this House has had its hands too full since the 1st of last December to conclude its labors earlier. He has told you of the many valuable services that the majority party here has rendered to the country during this session. He has pointed to the enactment of a bill which was to settle the question of caste and race upon the Pacific seaboard. I do not blame him that in the depth of his party poverty he has grasped at a thing that never belonged to him or his party; I do not blame him for claiming the credit of that which would not be a statute law to-day except that his party was powerless to prevent it. He wants credit for the Chinese bill, to which the other side of the House, with scarcely an exception, voted in opposition, and upon which a Republican President put the seal of his veto. He wants to go to the country claiming credit for having saved the Pacific slope from the tidal wave of Mongolian immigration that threatened to ingulf it.

In the depths of that same bankrupt political condition, he comes to claim credit for the passage of the most miserable political abortion that ever went forth from this or any preceding Congress in the shape of a tariff-commission bill, which already bears an unsavory flavor in the nostrils of honest people.

He goes further and claims credit for having relieved the tax-burdened people of this country from the onus of grievous taxation. Whom did you relieve? Nobody on this continent except the capitalist, the banker, and the dealer in drugs who makes his fortune out of proprietary medicines. The gentleman knows that there was not a decree entered in the secret caucus and council chamber of the bankers of this land that his party did not include in the passage of what is termed its "little"—its very "little revenue bill," which carried not one atom of relief to a single producer in this land.

The gentleman tells us that these things were matters of mighty weight, of great moment, which of necessity kept back the Appropriation Committee in its work until the other day you found yourselves in such a predicament that we had to come up to your rescue and pass through this House without objection, in less than sixty seconds, a joint resolution extending the appropriations in all the Departments of the Government for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of last month, in order to hide from the American people the deformities of negligence and inefficiency which stamped themselves upon this Republican majority.

You had no bills to consider, you had no legislation to enact; or if you had, you neglected to do so until we found ourselves thrust into another fiscal year without a dollar appropriated with which to carry on the departments of the Government. Yet this is the paradeful boast that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations comes in here to make as an opening campaign speech for the coming Congressional contest.

No, sir. This bill was finished in the room of the Committee on Appropriations five weeks ago. It was ready for report then. Your tariff-commission bill had passed. The edict of the banker had practically been obeyed. The banking question was practically settled. There was no excuse offered in that committee-room for withholding from the House these appropriation bills except that party necessity demanded that certain contested-election cases should be disposed of.

I believe this constitutes a field of worthy service over which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has disjointedly traveled, except one matter which I was about to omit—the one great service upon which, I doubt not, the gentleman proposes to recommend his party to the good opinion of the moral people of this country. He says his side of the House has delayed appropriation bills and held back needful legislation in order that the great Mormon question might be determined. He says that past Congresses have failed to grapple with that overwhelming issue. He claims credit for the manhood, the courage, the reckless boldness that actuated an unbridled and powerful majority to declare by vote that a man who had received 18,568 votes against 1,367 cast for another was not elected to a seat in this Congress. The Mormon question is one that the Republican party took charge of twenty years and more ago. That party has never yet dared to execute the law of its own creation against the Mormon community. It has never yet dared to demand an execution of its own statutes. But it contents itself with catching one worthy and reputable representative of that community three thousand miles from home and making faces at him by voting him out of a seat to which he was elected by thousands of his people.

There is not, Mr. Chairman, to be found in the records of this country an epoch in its political history when any member or exponent or mouth-piece of any party rested under heavier responsibility to make out a case for a delinquent party; and the gentleman from New York will not escape it either in this House or on the hustings, through the press, nor through the public speakers of the land. This party in majority here to-day must answer that account. It devolves upon it to explain why in seven months' continuous legislative session it could not find time to prepare and pass the bills needed for the maintenance and support of the different departments of this Government.

I do not wonder that he who opened this discussion and is charged with the conduct of this business abandoned his post of duty at the outset, never undertook to enlighten this House for ten minutes' time as to what was within the general purview or purpose of this measure, never dealt for any length of time whatever with the expanding necessities the Departments make on us for additional appropriations, but contents himself with asking of me the question whether I or others favored this increase of clerical force in the Pension Bureau of the country. I answer and tell him no; and I stand prepared to give my reasons. You are paying out to-day sixty millions of money for pensions.

The Commissioner of Pensions came before that committee and told us that he wanted $100,000,000 voted for the coming fiscal year. He told us he wanted $150,000,000 for the year succeeding that, and he told us in order to utilize these double and treble amounts he wanted twelve hundred additional clerks in the Pension Bureau of the country.

I answer frankly and candidly, and say to the gentleman from New York that I did not deem it wise to grant those suggestions. I do not see the necessity for doubling this year and trebling next year the pension burdens of the country, when you know, according to the testimony of the late Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Bentley, that a large percentage of necessity passes to-day upon forged and fraudulent papers into the pockets of men no more entitled to pensions than you or myself. Why? Because the department is overburdened. Its work is done in the midst of a rush. No counsel appears for the Government. Under the present system of taking proof to establish claims and inserting names on the pension-rolls of the country the Government is represented by no one. Ex parte statements in the shape of affidavits constitute the only testimony upon which those names find their way on the pension-rolls. And the Pension Commissioner lately gone out of service told the Committee on Appropriations over and over again the rush was so great that it was impossible to sift and get down to the merits of each individual case.

On the back of a statement like that comes a statement from the Commissioner, I doubt not capable and efficient as his friends claim him to be, but a new man, freshly inducted into the office, with a proposition to increase the clerical force of the Pension Bureau twelve hundred men. And it is done, and done to-day so far as the action of this House is concerned, to raise your pension list from $60,000,000 to $100,000,000 for the current year, and to raise it further to $150,000,000 in the next coming year.

I defy the man that lives to take the record of former Congresses and point to a single instance in which this side when dominant ever refused or withheld the fullest measure of consideration and pay to the pensioners of this land. I do not understand it is a cause of political disagreement simply because there may be a difference of opinion between one gentleman and another as to when the whole pension system shall be settled, in twelve months, or in three years, or in five years.

You are carrying a pension list to-day larger than the aggregate expenses of the American Government ever touched from the day of its foundation up to the outbreak of the war. You propose to double it, and next year treble it, and you have to-day, in round numbers, 260,000 men on your pension rolls. You have to-day a quarter of a million more pending on application before your Pension Bureau, to say nothing of the flood that comes in both Houses of Congress, representing claims which in the main have failed before the Commissioner under the provisions of the law.

These are some of the features, sir, I would have been glad the gentleman from New York had discussed instead of ranging the wider field of open national politics. I shall simply ask, Mr. Chairman, as this debate progresses to be heard on those sections of this bill to which I am opposed under the limitation of the five-minute rule. I repeat the assertion with which I began, that in the main I believe this to be a carefully prepared bill. I believe there are strong objections which lie to certain paragraphs and certain features of it.

I believe that one general criticism will lie against the whole bill, and that is that the Committee on Appropriations has not cut down or pruned as closely the estimate submitted as it might have done; and here just let me suggest a remark that I am sure will commend itself to the calm judgment and consideration of every member of this House. We all know that when the heads of Departments come to make estimates for their maintenance they are usually submitted upon the idea that the Committee on Appropriations will cut them down. They know by precedents that Congresses, both Republican and Democratic, have been disposed to a greater or less extent to shave and reduce the estimates of the Departments. Consequently, when a Secretary or head of a Department makes his estimate, he justly puts in a liberal estimate or allowance for the reduction which he expects to be made. We know when an appropriations committee comes to deal with the estimates, they deal with them with that fact firmly fastened in their minds. The consequence is that we will, and doubtless often do, here cut or reduce an estimate too much because we are misled by the conviction that the officer of the Government who makes the estimate has made it with a view to its possible reduction. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the good judgment of this House will in the consideration of this bill find more instances than one where the Committee on Appropriations has erred in not making that investigation and a corresponding reduction of the estimates.

Until then, sir, I shall content myself with the discussion of the bill by paragraphs or clauses as it comes before the committee for our consideration in that form, and yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. WILLIS.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before the gentleman from Kentucky yields the floor I desire to know, as I was not present during his remarks, whether the last Committee on Appropriations allowed all of the clerical force that was called for by the then Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman from Illinois by saying every dollar that was asked for for the payment of pensions was given by the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I would like to ask this further question, since the gentleman from New York was unable to recall the circumstances to mind, whether in any case before the Committee on Appropriations during that Congress any member of that committee, either Republican or Democrat, asked an increase of the force beyond what was allowed by the committee?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state, in response to this question, that the same rule of politeness and courtesy prevailed in the sub-committee of the last Congress that prevails in this one, and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL,] whom I do not now see in his seat, was chairman of the sub-committee on pensions in that Congress, and I was a member of the sub-committee; and when the then Commissioner of Pensions came before us I am sure it did not take thirty minutes to transact the business for which he came before us and perfect the bill, because we wrote into the bill every dollar he said the pension service of this country would require for that year. I now yield the floor.

Mr. CANNON. The answer of the gentleman from Kentucky, I think, would not be quite perfect, if the gentleman will allow me, with reference to these two questions without giving the estimates of the Commissioner of Pensions for the additional clerical force required; and I call the attention of my friend from Illinois, who was not present when the gentleman from Kentucky made his speech, to the fact that now, when the Republican side is in the majority in this House, the gentleman from Kentucky, as well as other members of the Committee on Appropriations, not only did not favor but did absolutely oppose the increase of clerical force required by the Pension Office to work upon these claims.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman state the figures? I have already said in the plainest Anglo-Saxon of which I am master, and I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will bear with me when I repeat, that I was opposed to the increase of that force to the extent of twelve hundred additional clerks by the bill which has lately passed this House; and that I was opposed to adopting the suggestions made for raising the pension appropriation for the present fiscal year to $100,000,000 and $150,000,000 for the next year. That I did oppose.

Mr. CANNON. So I understood the gentleman; but I wanted the question and answer to go with the questions of my colleague——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman is at perfect liberty to interject any portion of his own good speeches into mine.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desired to meet the statement of the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, when I asked these questions, for the reason that he could not remember whether the Republicans of that committee desired an increase or not; but I desire to know whether in the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress the gentleman from New York, or any other Republican member of that committee, sought to increase clerical force?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; upon the contrary, as a member of the sub-committee on pensions of the last Congress, of which, as I have said, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] was chairman, there was never a conference with the then Commissioner of Pensions but as I have stated; and there was but one instruction, and that was to draft a bill and give every dollar the Commissioner asked.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky, I think, does not answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Which gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HISCOCK. On the other side of the House. The question was whether you gave all that was asked for clerical force, and for agents to investigate the pensions——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have already answered that——

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to answer the question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me another question? The gentleman now refers to the creation of a corps of examiners or surgeons——

Mr. HISCOCK. No; I refer to the ordinary corps of clerks in the various bureaus to investigate the claims.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will state briefly, and then turn the gentleman over to the late chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan, was chairman of that sub-committee, and that the instruction given to him by myself and his other Democratic associates upon that sub-committee was to take every dollar the Commissioner wanted and write it into the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman knows as well as I do that the pension bill does not carry one dollar for a force to investigate and determine claims.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] yields to me a minute or a half minute, in which I may state to the committee in response to the inquiry made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that that Committee on Appropriations gave every dollar for every part of the clerical force that was asked for by the Bureau of Pensions.

Mr. RANDALL. Just the estimate.

Mr. ATKINS. We gave what they asked; and if there was any diminution or refusal on the part of the committee I was not cognizant of the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. WILLIS.]

Mr. WILLIS addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the gentleman's time be extended. I know of no gentleman on this side who desires to occupy the time of the committee on this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move the committee rise for the purpose of vacating the order for a session this evening. The House can again return into committee and the debate can be continued until later than five o'clock, if such be the wish of members.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had according to order had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suppose the other side does not wish an evening session for debate, although the time has been fixed for closing the general debate, and I now move that the order for an evening session be rescinded so far as the session for this evening is concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as this evening's session is concerned it is proposed to rescind the existing order.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] be allowed to continue his speech for thirty minutes, to be taken out of the time allowed for general debate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. To be taken out of the time allowed to those opposed to the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If that is satisfactory to the other side, all right.

Mr. HASKELL. I hope the time will be allowed to the gentleman from Kentucky, if it be satisfactory to the other side; that it shall come out of the time allowed for general debate on that side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. WILLIS resumed and concluded his remarks. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ATKINS obtained the floor and said: I yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If it is agreeable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE,] I will move that the committee rise. It is now nearly five o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. If you do that, you will not get your time for debate. The hour for closing the debate is fixed at two o'clock to-morrow, and it will not be extended.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I propose to offer at the proper time an amendment to this bill which will make provision for carrying into effect section 1753 of the Revised Statutes. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sum of $25,000 to defray the necessary expenses of carrying into effect section 1753 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BAYNE. The section referred to in the amendment is familiar to members of the House. The object of the appropriation is to enable the President to carry that section into effect. The range, however, of the amendment and the object comprehended by the section are limited in their nature. I desire on this occasion to devote myself to a wider and more important field.

Governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed," says the Declaration of Independence. The word governments, as here used, means their structure as well as their functions; the constitution and laws as well as the administration of them. The broad significance of the proposition is that the constitution and laws and the exercise of the authority conferred by them shall be acceptable to the people. Our system of government is supposed to embody more distinctly and fully than any other government on the face of the globe the principle of popular consent. I believe it does, but I am constrained by the logic of past and passing events to inquire if it be not possible to violate this principle to a dangerous extent, or in other words, to substitute under the forms of the Constitution and laws, a system of administration in conflict with it? I, for one, think that it is. It will almost inevitably result from the coalition of two conditions, one of which is ever present, which is the structure of the Government itself. The other is the occupation of the official positions of the Government by selfish, bad men.

Let me briefly analyze what I shall call the structural condition first. In round numbers the civil list of the National Government reaches an aggregate of a hundred thousand. Of these the people choose but two hundred and ninety-five, two hundred and ninety three of whom are members of the House of Representatives, and the other two of whom are the President and Vice-President, who are substantially chosen by the people. The seventy-six members of the Senate are chosen by the Legislatures of the States, and in some instances to my certain knowledge in defiance of the will of the majority of the people.

Clause 2 of section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution empowers the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But Congress may vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Under this provision of the Constitution and the laws that have been enacted by Congress, nearly all the appointments are made by the President and the heads of Departments. A very limited number of appointments are made by the judges of the courts. The great bulk of them, aggregating nearly a hundred thousand, are made by the President and heads of Departments. In reality all these are made by the President, for he appoints the heads of Departments and the maxim of qui facit per alium facit per se is not only applicable but there is no man living who has a more tender regard for the principle involved in that maxim than the American politician of the period.

The only appointable civil officers who are secure in their tenure are the 9 judges of the Supreme Court, the 9 judges of the circuit courts, the 54 judges of the district courts, and the 6 judges of the courts of the District of Columbia, making 78. The twenty-odd attachés of the President; the Secretary of State and the eighty-odd subordinates in his office, and the three hundred-odd ministers, consuls, &c., who represent our country abroad; the Secretary of the Treasury and the 3,000 subordinates in his office here, and the 10,000 under his Department through the country; the Postmaster-General and the 500 in his office here, the 3,000 in the railway mail service, and the 45,000 postmasters and their subordinates through the country; the Secretary of the Interior and the 1,700 in his office and bureaus here, and the 5,000 who have positions over the country; the Attorney-General and his fifty-odd subordinates here, and the 54 United States district attorneys and 54 United States marshals and their deputies through the country; the Secretary of War and the seven hundred-odd civilians in his Department here, and the thousands at large under the Engineer's Department; the Secretary of the Navy and the 150 civil subordinates here, and the thousands employed at large; the Commissioner of Agriculture and his one hundred-odd subordinates; the Public Printer and his 1,500 employés; all these, and many I have not included, for my estimates are but approximate, though I think I have kept well within the mark, hold their positions subject only to the will of the President.

A mere caprice may actuate him to remove one, ten, or a thousand, and to appoint others in their places. Party zeal, personal pique, factional spirit, selfish ambition, the frenzy of intoxication, or the madness of passion, any motive may influence him to sweep out the entire civil list, with the exceptions I have named, and to appoint any persons he may choose to fill it up again.

What enormous power! The extent of it is scarcely conceivable. No emperor, monarch, or potentate in any civilized nation of the world has equal power. The power of some of the executive authorities of European nations may be more arbitrary in some respects, but no one of them can exert a more influential and controlling domination than the President of the United States. The Queen of England is powerless as compared with him.

But is there no limitation on this power of the Executive? Is he subject to no restraint?

There is no adequate limitation or restraint. The Executive may do many mischievous things without subjecting himself to the restraints provided by the Constitution. He may be impeached, but he must commit treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors to incur that condemnation. As to those appointments which are made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, there would be some limitation on the exercise of the appointing power of the President during the portion of the year the Senate is in session, if the Senate would exercise its authority in the spirit of the Constitution, but all hope of such salutary intervention is dead and buried with the bones of the fathers. The nominations of the Executive are confirmed on a principle that was discovered by Andrew Jackson during his administration, but was wholly unknown before that time, namely, that the Executive is responsible and should make such appointments as he sees fit.

Now, there is not a line in the Constitution that confers on the President the power of removal from office. There is nothing in the spirit of the Constitution and the laws which puts that power in his hands. On the contrary, Congress has power to make all laws which are necessary for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof; and when Congress created a fixed tenure of four years, as it has done in regard to United States district attorneys, marshals, certain classes of postmasters, and other officers, and when it placed no limitation on the tenure, as is the case of collectors of internal revenue, it absolutely precluded the right of the Executive to remove any officer during his term, except for good and sufficient cause. And the power of the Executive to remove for cause can be supported only on the principle of necessity. Why, think of it! Did the framers of the Constitution intend that the people should be governed by law? If they so intended, the construction I contend for must obtain. If, on the other hand, they intended that the people should be governed by the will of the Executive, then the laws of Congress fixing a tenure of office encroach on the Executive authority, and ought to be repealed without delay.

But how does this conclusion comport with the proposition that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed? It is generally believed in this country that the laws of Congress embody the popular will. It is thought, too, that these laws are binding on everybody, even on the Executive. Nay, it is a popular impression that the Executive is particularly bound to respect and obey the laws, because it is his sworn duty to faithfully execute them. If his will be the supreme law of the land, and I unhesitatingly say that the removal of a faithful officer during his tenure is an assertion of that supremacy, the sooner we abolish the Constitution and laws and relapse into a thorough autocracy the better. Such a course would save much bickering and agitation and make the system of personal government secure and perfect.

And still another test may be applied to show the weakness and futility of the Constitution and the laws, if the latter-day construction of them be accepted. There is no man in the country so feeble intellectually as not to know that if Garfield had lived the policy of his administration would have been as unlike that of the present Executive as the administration of Washington or Jefferson was unlike that of Jackson or Van Buren. Garfield believed in the reign of law. The present Executive believes in personal government. According to the theory of those who concede to the Executive the right to do about as he pleases, because he is responsible, a single human life only may stand between systems of administration as opposite as the antipodes. The bullet of an assassin may in the twinkling of an eye precipitate a revolution in the methods of administration, and all this change may take place in accordance with the Constitution and laws!

No; that will not do. What is wanted is the construction put upon the Constitution by the fathers. What is wanted is, not a limited, but an enlarged responsibility. What is wanted is that citizens, whether in official station or not, shall be alike subject to law. It would promote these ends to have open executive sessions of the Senate, that every Senator, if he so acts, shall be held responsible for the removal of capable officers during their term and for the appointment of political henchmen in their places. And it would promote these ends to have Senators elected by the people and not by Legislatures so that they may feel their responsibility. To effectuate this last proposition I introduced, on the 9th day of January, 1882, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution making Senators elective by the people, and apportioning them to the States at the rate of one for each million of inhabitants over two millions. I should like to see the Judiciary Committee favorably report that resolution.

The personal control of the administration of affairs, instead of the control of law, is not only a violation of the Constitution as it ought to be interpreted but it entails a multitude of consequences inimical to the public welfare and the good of individuals.

One of the Kings of England once said, "While I can appoint the bishops and judges, I can have what religion and laws I please."

The influences which the President can exert under existing methods have a wider range and a greater potency than those involved in the proposition of the King. Making appointments to office by the Executive at the personal solicitation of Senators and Representatives is almost necessarily mutually demoralizing. It is particularly so in reference to the Executive and Senators, because of the power of the Senate to confirm a large number of the most important appointments. It is calculated to beget a lively sense of favors received. It has two manifestly demoralizing effects: one is to disarm criticism of the Executive on the part of the Senator or Representative, and the other is to tempt the Executive to go further in the wrong direction than he would otherwise dare to go. If the Executive knows that the United States Senate stands ready to justify and vindicate his acts, of course he will be bold, serene, and happy.

In a friendly correspondence between John Adams (afterward President) and Roger Sherman, the question was discussed as to whether the President should have the exclusive right to appoint to office, or by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Adams insisted that the power should be wholly in the President, because of the corruption the other method superinduced. Sherman argued that it should be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, because of the danger to the safety and liberties of the people, if such vast power were in the hands of the President alone. Adams said:

It has a natural tendency to excite ambition in the Senate. An active, ardent spirit in that house, who is rich and able, has a great reputation and influence, will be solicited by candidates for office; not to introduce the idea of bribery, because, though it certainly would force itself in, in other countries, and will probably here, when we grow prosperous and rich, yet it is not yet, I hope, to be dreaded. But ambition must come in already. A Senator of great influence will be naturally ambitious, and desirous of increasing his influence. Will he not be under a temptation to use his influence with the President, as well as his brother Senators, to appoint persons to office in the several States who will exert themselves in elections to get out his enemies or opposers, both in Senate and House of Representatives, and to get in his friends, perhaps his instruments? * * * In this point of view I am very apprehensive, and this defect in our Constitution will have an unhappy tendency to introduce corruption of the grossest kinds, both of ambition and avarice, into all our elections. And this will be the worst of poisons to our Constitution; it will not only destroy the present form of government but render it almost impossible to substitute in its place any free government, even a better limited monarchy, or any other than a despotism, or a simple monarchy.

The apprehensions of both these eminent men were well founded. Unfortunately, however, all the apprehensions of Madison have been realized, while the advantages hoped for by Sherman have not; for the President's power seems to be as complete and absolute practically as if the intended restraint on its exercise by the Senate had no place in the Constitution. How and by whom and for what purpose appointments to office are now made, for instance, are well known facts to this House and to the country. Formerly these things were mostly done in secret. The audacity to do them in open day and before witnesses remained to be developed by the practical politicians of the present Administration. In the New York Tribune of the 16th instant I find the following, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read:

AN IRATE SENATOR.

WASHINGTON, June 15.—A few weeks ago Senator VAN WYCK heard that the postmaster of a little office in Nebraska was about to be removed, and he protested against it. The man was, however, removed during the Senator's absence. Upon his return he called upon First Assistant Postmaster-General Hatton and learned that it had been done upon the recommendation of the "contingent Congressman" Majors, an additional Congressman whom the people of Nebraska had been electing on the ground of their large population, in the hope of his admission. In the mean time Majors's credentials had been rejected by the House committee. The new postmaster had resigned after a few days' service, and after learning how small the compensation of the office was, Senator VAN WYCK suggested that the old postmaster be reinstated, and Mr. Hatton promised that this should be done. It was not done, however, and yesterday Senator VAN WYCK called at the Post-Office Department to see about it. He was informed by Mr. Hatton that the matter had been referred to Postmaster-General Howe, and was requested to go into the latter's room and see about it. Senator VAN WYCK did so, finding the Postmaster-General at his desk, and two or three other gentlemen, including Secretary Teller, also present. The interview is reported to have been both interesting and amusing.

The Senator made known his errand, and Mr. Howe in reply made some criticism upon the Senator's course in the Senate.

"What's the matter?" queried the Senator in surprise.

"Why," rejoined the Cabinet officer, "you don't stand by your friends."

"I do stand by my friends," said the Senator. "What do you mean?"

"Well, how did you vote upon the Worthington case?"

"Oh, I didn't vote at all upon that. I was absent. I was opposed to Worthington, and did all I could against him. I paired. What next?"

"Well, how about the Buckner case?"

The Senator did not recall the Buckner case at once, having been absent from town when it was brought up. This was the case fully detailed in the Tribune, where Mr. Wilson, as internal-revenue collector, holding the highest grade in the service, was removed after being two years in office, to make room for a Grant man.

When the Postmaster-General had concluded his catechism, the Senator, who, though exceedingly good-natured, has no hesitation in expressing his opinions in unequivocal terms, turned upon his questioner and said: "This accounts for the delay, does it? I want to know if you intend me to understand that because I vote according to my convictions in the Senate my suggestions are to be unheeded by this Administration? Is that what you mean? If it is, tell me so plainly and I will never darken your doors again. I just want to know the fact, so it may be made known to my constituents that, simply because of my votes in the Senate, their representative is to be denied all influence in the Departments under this Administration."

Mr. BAYNE. To comment on this would be a work of supererogation. I pause only to commend it to the consideration of my countrymen in connection with the prophecies of Madison.

SPOILS SYSTEM.

Another great evil resulting from the personal government of the Executive is what is popularly known as the spoils system. This system is operated by a combination of active politicians, of whom the Executive is necessarily and ex officio the chief. Without the consent and co-operation of the Executive the system is imperfect, if not impossible. The objects of the combination are power and plunder. The power resides in an official who can mediately or immediately make appointments to office. The plunder is the emoluments of the offices. To attain or to retain power the politicians in the combination sedulously inculcate the idea through their newspaper organs that the party to which they belong must have leaders who are adroit managers.

These managers have their grades. These managers are popularly known now by the name of bosses. There is a chief boss, who is over all. Then there are subsidiary bosses, whose grades vary with their power and efficiency. Like the general of an army, the chief boss issues his orders, and all the subsidiary bosses and the organs implicitly obey. The discipline among the commissioned officers, who are the bosses, big and little, is almost perfect. Obedience is rewarded; disobedience is punished. If any member of the party ventures to protest against the methods of the bosses, he is treated as a mutineer; if he refuses to vote for any candidate the bosses have nominated, he is cashiered for desertion. He must vote for an ox if that animal be on the ticket. No insubordination whatever is tolerated.

The bosses secure the appointment of themselves or some of their reliable henchmen to all the offices. They are so anxious that the offices should be filled by reliable men that they see to it whenever they can that offices of honor as well as offices of profit are given to persons whom they select. And as the Queen of England will confer the star or garter on those who serve her with distinction, so the progressive bosses of our Republic have constituted a political knighthood, and awarded a bronze medal as a badge of membership to the brave men who stand firm at a trying time for the maintenance of their cause. To be a Sir Knight of that fraternity is now a good thing for those who want a Federal office.

Having filled the offices, the bosses raise funds, not by assessing themselves, as is erroneously supposed by some people, but by assessing the subordinates in the various offices. Refusal on the part of the assessed to honor the demand is adequate cause for removal; while payment of the demand, coupled with active political work in the interest of the boss, is indisputable evidence of "ascertained fitness." Having plenty of funds and a well organized and thoroughly disciplined force of active men, and a lot of newspaper organs, which teem with praise of the boss and derogation of those who dispute his authority, the boss is prepared for work. He is able to choose committees, to carry primaries, to control conventions, and to nominate candidates for all elective offices, from the President down, with about as much certainty as he names Federal officers with an administration at his back.

The boss system is made practicable by a variety of causes, of which the Federal appointing power is the chief one. Through that power of the Executive a vast number of active, keen, and often influential, men become its ready supporters and defenders. Then these men represent official authority, which naturally adds to their influence as political workers. They know whence their appointments come, and ordinary gratitude, one of the best of human attributes, naturally responds to the demands made upon it. Then again they depend in many cases on the positions they hold for the support of themselves and their families. When appointments are held at the arbitrary will of one man, it is perfectly natural that the allegiance of the appointees should run up to him, and he can be a tyrant if he will. His more immediate subordinates, who are recognized as having authority to speak and to act for him, partake of the arrogance of his power, and can be tyrants also if they will, in the spheres of their political or official action. The concentration of political as well as official power is the inevitable result of such a system, and nothing short of an organic change, which I shall hereafter point out, will effectually overthrow it.

I do not believe the masses of the people realize the dangerous extent to which this system has developed. Nobody knows better than the managers that the civil service must be reasonably good and efficient, so far as actual administration is concerned. It is unquestionably so administered in the main. But this only mitigates the evils of the system, and in mitigating them makes them more insidious and therefore dangerous. There is no use denying that these evils exist. If the civil service be free from the improper influences that largely make and control it, why do not our national and State conventions say so? Why do they condemn the office and the influence of the spoilsmen? In 1876 the Republican National Convention adopted a platform which contained the following plank:

Under the Constitution the President and heads of Departments are to make nominations for office; the Senate is to advise and consent to appointments, and the House of Representatives to accuse and prosecute faithless officers. The best interest of the public service demands that these distinctions be respected: that Senators and Representatives, who may be judges and accusers, should not dictate appointments to office. The invariable rule in appointments to office should have reference to the honesty, fidelity, and capacity of the appointees, giving to the party in power those places where harmony and vigor of administration require its policy to be represented, but permitting all others to be filled by persons selected with sole reference to the efficiency of the public service, and the right of all citizens to share in the honor of rendering faithful service to the country.

That admits all. The Democratic party, unwilling to be outdone in the way of making fair promises, adopted a similar plank in its platform. General Hayes, in his letter of acceptance, committed himself to the policy of that plank. And because Hayes in a large measure practiced the precepts of that plank during his administration he was denounced, berated, and belittled by the managers, and they became so offended at his "amiable obstinacy," as his firmness was called, in maintaining the principles of the platform that the great managers, the tremendous fellows, without whom the party would go to the dogs, refused to speak to him and kept away from the White House with more fidelity than they ever did anything else in the world.

In 1880 both parties again made good promises regarding the civil service. Plank 5 of the Republican platform is as follows:

The Republican party, adhering to the principles affirmed by its last national convention, of respect for the constitutional rules governing appointments to office, adopts the declarations of President Hayes, that the reform of the civil service should be thorough, radical, and complete. To this end it demands the co-operation of the legislative with the Executive Departments of the Government, and that Congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper practical tests, shall admit to the public service.

Here is a reaffirmation of the explicit and sound declarations of 1876 and an indorsement of President Hayes's course in this regard. Garfield accepted the platform, and would have largely carried it out if he had been permitted to live. And Mr. Arthur accepted too. And in his letter of acceptance he says:

The resolution referring to the public service seems to me deserving of approval. * * * It seems to me that the rules which should be applied to the management of the public service may properly conform, in the main, to such as regulate the conduct of successful private business. Original appointments should be based upon ascertained fitness. The tenure of office should be stable. Positions of responsibility should, so far as practicable, be filled by the promotion of worthy and efficient officers.

And now, with a view to showing in a general way the lengths to which personal government may go to serve a small minority of the people as against the wishes of the masses, I will give a brief résumé of Mr. Arthur's administration.

July 15, 1880, Mr. Arthur made that promise to the people of the United States. A little over eight months ago he became the President. And how has he discharged his duties? I will not undertake to specify cases; my time would not be sufficient; nor is it necessary; for localities, communities, whole States can answer the question. The people of New York and the people of Pennsylvania, the people of Massachusetts and the people of South Carolina, the people of Illinois and the people of Virginia, the people of the entire Union can answer that question. President Arthur has violated his promises and set at naught the principles of the Republican party. He has removed many faithful and competent officers without cause and while in commission, thus not only violating his promise but, as I believe, the Constitution and laws as well.

I will show what he has done as to internal-revenue collectors by way of example. He has changed twenty-four of them, who have 1,428 subordinates. That is a good deal to do in half a year.

Who will say that these changes of internal-revenue collectors, and the numerous changes of postmasters, marshals, &c., are made with a view to improving the service? It will be noted that promotions are rarely made. The appointees as a rule are new and untried men. There must be a motive for making these changes, for even Mr. Arthur would hesitate, in view of his declarations and the protest of the masses of the people, if he were not impelled by some motive which imparts a considerable degree of hardihood. There is a motive, and that motive is to establish and maintain a political machine. This Administration very soon after its accession began to make appointments on a well-defined proscription for political opinions, and the wayfaring man cannot help but see that the object is to intrench itself and its factional following in the official positions of the Government with a view to perpetuating its ascendency and control. It is not the success of the Republican party that is sought, but the resurrection of a minority of that party by the systematic dispensation of patronage.

In a word, the Executive and those from whom he takes advice have undertaken the peculiar task of stalwartizing the Republican party, and that too when the very name of stalwart has become a reproach. The stalwarts compose not only a minority of the party but a very small minority. There is not a corporal's guard of stalwarts in any of the Western States except Illinois. In Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska there are no stalwarts worth mentioning. Enough cannot be found to fill the offices. If there be, I should be glad to have it stated by any of the Representatives from those States. Illinois has a few, but the independent Republicans outnumber the stalwarts ten to one, I am told, in that State. If I am in error, I would be glad to be corrected by any of the Representatives from that State.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman is mistaken as to that.

Mr. BAYNE. I may be. I am not so fully advised as to California, Oregon, Nevada, and Colorado, but I doubt not the stalwarts could be easily enumerated in those States.

Mr. STEELE. In Indiana we are neither independents nor stalwarts, as you are in Pennsylvania, but all Republicans.

Mr. BAYNE. Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island are singularly free from this political incubus of stalwartism. Massachusetts has only enough of them to fill a part of the offices. New Jersey has very few of them. Pennsylvania and New York have the largest proportion of them, but I am sure that a vast majority of the Republicans of these States are not stalwarts. This faction cannot retain power. The support of the most powerful corporations of the country in connection with the entire patronage of the Government, though the latter reach a hundred thousand appointees with a hundred millions of dollars in salaries, will not suffice to bring about so deplorable a consummation. Nor will combinations with repudiators or leagues with the merchantable portion of the Democracy avail. The bullet of Guiteau made a mark on the forehead of stalwartism that can never be effaced.

Here again we are confronted with the imperfection of the Constitution as it has been construed for the last fifty years. It becomes again evident that the administrative functions of the Government are capable of and afford opportunities for the most serious abuses, and the condition precedent to the perpetration of such abuses is that the Executive should be a bad or a weak man.

REMEDY.

The evils which I have to some extent undertaken to point out are palpable enough. What is the remedy?

The civil-service associations of the country seem to unite in recommending a plan similar to the English civil-service system. They have indorsed, I believe without exception, a bill introduced into the Senate by Senator PENDLETON, of Ohio, which provides a commission which shall examine all applicants for position in the subordinate civil service of the Government, and recommend those in the order of their merit who fulfill the applied tests. Promotions shall be made on the grounds of qualification. The bill fixes no term, and is therein essentially defective. The most vital element of such a law would be a fixed, stable tenure, which is the only protection, in connection with the proper construction of the Constitution, against Executive aggression.

The intention of the bill is good, and if perfected and put into operation and carried out in good faith it would undoubtedly ameliorate the condition of the civil service. But it will be a mistake to rest the hopes of reform of the civil service on any such plan. It must be preceded by more radical measures. The Executive who is capable of removing a competent officer without cause, in the face of the Constitution and the laws of Congress which fix the tenure of his office, would have no difficulty in extinguishing the whole system. The Executive and his subordinates would be intrusted with its execution. What power shall compel the Executive?

The efficacious remedy for the evils of administration must be planted in the Constitution. And the first thing to be done in that direction is to diminish the power of the Executive and increase the power of the people. The way to accomplish this is simple and plain. It is this: make every officer of the Government, where it is practicable, elective by the people. With a view in some measure to this end, I introduced into the House on the 13th day of February last a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of certain United States officers by the people.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. All postmasters, revenue collectors, marshals, and United States district attorneys for the district courts of the United States shall be elected by the people of the States in which their duties are to be performed.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article."

Mr. BAYNE. I should like to see the provisions of this amendment extended to all officers whom it is practicable to elect by the popular vote. Many reasons can be given for the adoption of such an amendment. In the limited time I have I can do but little more than state some of them:

1. It would limit the executive power. I have shown how necessary that is.

2. It would enlarge the power of the people. No objection will lie against this that will not lie against the whole theory of government of the people, for the people, and by the people. It may be said that conventions are so manipulated that the fittest and best qualified are not chosen. That may occur, but the fittest and best qualified are not appointed, and the danger of one man making a mistake is infinitely greater than that a multitude of men will make a mistake. Besides that, there are always two parties, and sometimes more. If the majority party becomes reckless in proposing candidates it may be taught a lesson at the polls by the rejection of its candidates. The minority party is mostly on its good behavior, and it will see to it that acceptable candidates are proposed. That gives the people the choice, and therein lies the great safeguard of popular government.

3. It would create official responsibility to those immediately concerned in the administration of the offices. The responsibility of the elected to the people would be direct, and the responsibility of the subordinates would be next to direct. That this plan works well is abundantly attested by experience. Nearly all the officers in the various States are elected by the people. Many of the State officers formerly appointable are now elective. The evolution of this tendency is visible everywhere in the States. The fact implies a departure from the monarchical form of government, and the development and crystallization of the idea of self-government.

4. It would remove the corrupt and corrupting alliances between the Executive and Senators and Representatives in Congress.

5. It would leave Senators and Representatives in Congress free to criticise the Executive.

How advantageous that would be to the assertion of individuality and honest conviction can be better understood here than anywhere else in the country.

6. It would free the Executive from undue influence on the part of members of Congress.

7. It would relieve members of Congress from the embarrassment of recommending appointments.

8. It would secure the selection of a better class of Senators and Representatives.

9. It would result in the choice of the best administrative officials.

10. It would uproot and destroy the spoils system, so far as that is practicable in human affairs.

Now, sir, I have given a number of reasons why the fundamental change I propose should be adopted. There are many more that could be given. I feel that I have only hinted at them. The subject is new. It requires much thought, many minds, the attention of the press, to present it fully. It must challenge attention, earnest attention, if popular government is to remain. I cannot say in words too earnest, nor in phrase too expressive, that it is my deliberate conviction that our Government must be relieved from the internal and dangerous tendencies that beset it if it shall long live.

It will be difficult, sir, I know, to make constitutional changes, and particularly that kind of change which will involve the surrender of power. The history of the world shows but few instances where governmental authority has been voluntarily given up. The menace of revolution, or revolution itself, has nearly always been necessary to check the aggrandizement or diminish the force of this acquisition. Here we have party power and we have official power, and whatever party may be in control, may be expected to resist any innovation that will have a tendency to weaken these supposed elements of strength and perpetuity.

All these things are obstacles in the way of modifying the Constitution. But that modification must come. The people are sovereign, and if they will make secure and safe self-government, it is their highest and most patriotic duty to eliminate out of their system of government the corrupting and corroding influences of centralized executive power, and to choose themselves in all practicable cases those who shall make, adjudge, and administer their laws.

And now, sir, one word more and I shall finish. I disclaim all authority to speak for anybody but myself. But, sir, if I understand the views of the masses of the people of the country, without regard to party, they are in accord with what I have said. If I may judge the Republican party by what it has done, if I comprehend its purposes and aspirations, the vista of its further progress and achievements opens on the high plane I have but too feebly essayed to portray. Believing that my party is imbued with this spirit I cannot sit silent in the presence of the evils that menace it from within and put on its fair fame undeserved reproaches. At the very citadel of its power and in the zenith of its glory its trusts are abused, its confidence is shaken, and its hopes are frustrated. I believe it to be an imperious duty to say that the Republican party is not responsible for these things.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter upon any mere political discussion, but shall confine myself to a matter of deep interest to my constituents involved in an amendment I shall offer at the proper time to the sundry civil appropriation bill. The amendment in brief is to appropriate $75,000 to build a quay-wall to protect the river front of the New London navy-yard. I shall ask the committee to amend the bill in the manner that I have indicated, on two grounds, which, in my opinion, not only deserve full and impartial consideration but should command the support of a majority of the members of the House.

I ask this action on the part of the committee, first, because the appropriation that the amendment which I have presented calls for is not for the purchase of any addition to the territory embraced in the yard for the erection of any new and expensive buildings or of any structure that immediate necessity does not imperatively demand; it is solely and simply to appropriate the means required to build a quay-wall, recommended by Rear-Admiral Nichols, the present very intelligent chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, in his report to the Secretary of the Navy in December last, it being absolutely necessary in order to protect the water-front of the yard from being seriously impaired by the currents of the river and the tidal waves which daily dash against the gravel bank, cutting that away and carrying the soil into the ship-channel in front of the same, and gradually but certainly diminishing the depth of the channel.

I also ask for this appropriation because I claim that when the State of Connecticut purchased the lands constituting the yard and generously gave the same to the United States the Government, speaking through Congress, accepted the gift with a full and explicit understanding that it should be forever held and used as a naval station, forever kept in repair, and gradually developed and improved. There can be no doubt but that this was the distinct understanding between the high contracting parties when the one executed and presented the instrument conveying the same, and the other, in view of all the facts obtained from a most careful investigation, accepted and received the property conveyed.

Let me briefly sketch the history of this navy-yard on the Thames. In March, 1867, Congress passed an act by which the Secretary of the Navy was "directed to receive and accept a deed of gift, when offered by the State of Connecticut, of a tract of land situated on the Thames River, near New London, Connecticut, and with a water-front of not less than one mile, to be held by the United States for naval purposes." The first overtures, mark you, for this transfer of property to be used as a navy-yard came from the General Government. Can there be any misinterpretation, I ask the committee, of the language that Congress in its act of March, 1867, addressed to the State of Connecticut? Can it bear any other meaning than this: that if the State of Connecticut would, by deed of gift, present to the United States this magnificent site for a naval station on the banks of the Thames, then, in that event, the General Government would forever honorably maintain and generously improve the same, until it should become in fact one of the leading naval stations of this Union if not of the world?

And Congress had every inducement to assume the obligations that this agreement with the State of Connecticut imposed upon the United States. The united and uncontradicted testimony of intelligent and impartial witnesses, given at different times in response to official inquiries, have established the fact that for the purposes of a first-class naval station this site is unsurpassed by any other site on the entire Atlantic coast. It had been pronounced by a commission of senior officers of our Navy, soon after the close of our revolutionary struggle, as "the best harbor in the United States" in which to "establish one grand yard and depot for the entire American Navy." And this judgment was subsequently concurred in by Commodores Hull, Rogers, Decatur, Jones, Morris, and Biddle, all stationed there prior to or during the war of 1812–'15, and who, by daily observation, knew whereof they spoke; and more recently by such distinguished naval commanders as Admirals Foote, Stringham, Paulding, Gregory, Lanman, Wyman, and Fairfax, and Commodores Van Brunt, Gardiner, Ringgold, Simpson, and Hopkins, several of whom have been, at different periods, in charge of the yard.

In response to this invitation, extended by the Congress of the United States to the State of Connecticut, the Legislature of the State, at the annual session of the same, in May, 1867, authorized the condemnation and purchase by the State for the use of the United States of a tract of land selected by commissioners appointed by the Navy Department acting in conjunction with commissioners appointed by the State. In this manner a clear and indefeasible title to the territory embraced in this yard was obtained, and in 1868 the same was conveyed by the State of Connecticut to the United States, and formally accepted by the latter for the uses and purposes for which it was conveyed.

And here let me say to the committee that it is apparent from the facts which I have already stated that Congress did not enter blindly upon this arrangement with the State of Connecticut and accept this free gift of a naval site from the State without a full knowledge of its capabilities and advantages. At an earlier day that body had caused a careful examination to be made of the fitness of this site for a first-class naval station. Upon the recommendation of Hon. Gideon Welles, then Secretary of the Navy, Congress in 1862 authorized him to appoint a board of trained naval officers and skilled engineers to examine the harbor of New London and the river Thames in connection with other proposed sites for a navy-yard. When these officers and engineers had completed the work assigned to them, they made a formal report, which embraced facts that gave intelligent and indisputable evidence of the superior advantages of this site for a first-class permanent naval depot and yard. The action of this commission, composed as it was of distinguished and experienced naval officers, was fully indorsed by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Thirty-eighth Congress, who, by order of the House, made a personal inspection of the harbor of New London and the river Thames, heard the arguments, and weighed the evidence presented for and against the site, and then recommended it to Congress as possessing all the requisites of a great naval establishment.

Among its leading advantages, as set forth in the two reports, to which I have called the attention of the committee, I will briefly cite the following:

1. One continuous mile of available water-front, with a channel adjoining of from 27 to 36 feet in depth.

2. An adjoining basin or roadstead, with good anchorage, ample to contain the whole Navy of the United States—a very important condition for a first-class naval station.

3. Easy access to and from the ocean, with a channel free from ice, fast or floating, at all seasons.

4. An ample area of land, which can be extended to meet any possible requirement of the service.

5. The land is nearly a level plateau, at an elevation sufficient to protect it from the tide, affording secure foundations for heavy superstructures without the necessity of piling.

6. Granite and timber may be found in abundance in the immediate vicinity, sufficient for the construction of walls, docks, and buildings of every description.

7. Railroads and steamboats connect the site with the great sources of supply of ship-timber, labor, and materials used in such an establishment.

8. The location of the site seven miles from the mouth of the river places it out of the range of any known projectile, while the presence of Forts Trumbull and Griswold and a formidable water battery at the entrance of the harbor renders it not only defensible but already defended.

9. The protection of the city of New York and its commerce is of paramount importance. The location of the new yard must afford that protection, without its own defense being involved in that of the city. The site at New London happily answer these conditions. It is nearly opposite the entrance to Long Island Sound from the ocean. By this entrance New York is exposed to the approach of a hostile fleet on the east. Long Island Sound, with Gardiner's Bay and adjacent waters, is a great roadstead, which, once entered by an enemy's fleet, would furnish anchorage and a haven from which he could threaten the city of New York, and cut off the commerce of New England from its accustomed market. It was here that the British fleet lay during the war of 1812, threatening our whole coast line. This entrance, in the event of a naval war, must at all hazards be kept inviolate. New London, by its strategic position, is the key to this gateway, and the presence of an adequate naval force at the station on the Thames, within less than an hour's steaming, would, in the judgment of eminent naval authorities, afford the best possible security against the lodgment of a hostile fleet in this great natural roadstead. The defense of this gateway contributes alike to the security of the city and the station, but the loss of neither necessarily involves the safety of the other.

The harbor of New London is admirably protected from violent storms and irruptions of the sea by the high lands on each side of the same. In the coldest winters it is never obstructed by ice, and is therefore accessible to vessels of every description at all seasons of the year. There is adequate depth of water and ample space for anchorage for ships of the largest class, and in violent gales hundreds of the coasting vessels that are constantly passing through Long Island Sound seek its shelter and ride out the storm in safety. Not only the harbor of New London but the river Thames is scarcely ever obstructed by ice below Allyn's Point, the terminus on the same of the Norwich and Worcester Railroad, four miles above the site of the navy-yard. And vessels which are engaged in the transportation of iron, coal, lumber, cotton, and the various other materials required by the great and almost countless mechanical and manufacturing industries that are scattered throughout the New England States have at all times and seasons free access to this point.

I wish for a few moments to call the attention of the committee to the present status of the yard. It is not only, as I have endeavored to show, ever free from the obstruction of ice, having a proper depth of water to float the largest ships along its entire shore-line, with a soil upon which large buildings and heavy machinery can be placed upon solid foundations, with a quarry on its eastern side from which the finest granite can be obtained in unlimited quantities; with sand in another locality in abundance for all building purposes; with an exhaustless supply of water, as soft and as pure as the dropping rain, that can be reached by shallow wells; with a natural pond in its immediate vicinity, and on an elevation one hundred feet above it, from which a volume of water can at all times be drawn ample to propel the machinery used in the construction and repair of vessels of war; located in a climate that is unsurpassed for healthfulness; but, in addition to all these great natural advantages that cluster around this site, it has already been so improved by appropriations heretofore made that if it can be protected from impairment, in the manner contemplated by the amendment which I shall offer to the bill, the Government would be able with comparatively small expenditures to utilize it for many purposes connected with the Navy. Some twenty acres of the ground contiguous to the river have been graded and prepared as the site for such structures as the future requirements of the yard will demand; two large brick storehouses, dwellings for the commandant and other officers and the employés stationed at the yard, have been erected; a brick building 180 feet in length by 40 feet in breadth has been built the last year, under the orders of the late Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Mr. Hunt, for the use of the apprentices on the training-ships, and a wharf 1,600 feet in length was constructed some years ago, at which the largest vessels in our Navy may lie.

I have called the attention of the committee to the fact that this yard is so admirably located near the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, called the Race, that it can be made an important means of defense to the great and rapidly increasing commerce that floats upon the sound, and the towns and cities that line the entire Connecticut and Long Island shores. In support of this claim I would cite a part of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who examined this site, as I have stated, in obedience to a resolution passed by the Thirty-eighth Congress:

> New London, lying within a half-hour's steaming, is the natural key and strategic protection to this gateway, and it is the judgment of the highest military and naval authorities that a rendezvous of iron-clads, to put to sea at short notice, together with some slight fortifications at the "Race" itself, would be a complete defense to the eastern approach to New York and the whole coast line of Connecticut. An enemy's fleet once within this gateway and safe in Long Island Sound—a great man-of-war's harbor of itself—would not only have the best natural roadstead on this continent from which to sally forth to cut up our commerce and lay our cities under contribution but would imperil the commercial metropolis of the country.
> Through Long Island Sound is carried, by various means of transportation, the raw material to the New England spindles, much of which is returned in the manufactured articles to New York for domestic and foreign markets. So large has this commerce become that more than fifty thousand vessels have passed New London light-boat, off the mouth of the harbor, in a single year, calling forth the memorable remark of Daniel Webster, "that the importance of this Mediterranean of the Western Hemisphere would justify its being lighted up like a ballroom."
> These have seemed very important considerations to your committee; and if by the selection of a site which unites so many essential advantages of its own, commercial interests so vast and so extended also derive incidental protection, the establishment of the proposed yard at this point would appear to raise the question to one of national importance and necessity.

The commerce on the sound has more than doubled since this report was made to Congress. In the light of these telling facts the leading business men of the city of New York have long looked upon this site of the navy-yard on the Thames as the strategic point which guarded the entrance to the sound and protected the commercial interests of New England and New York. Twice has the Chamber of Commerce in that city, entertaining similar opinions, in earnest and eloquent words called upon Congress to give liberally for the improvement of this yard. I quote from one of their addresses:

> Situated nearly midway between two great commercial cities, with ample means for obtaining supplies of all kinds at short notice; in the midst of an industrious and ingenious people, whose labor is skillful and cheap; of easy communication by land and water with all parts of the country and the world, the site on the Thames River possesses every requisite for a first-class naval establishment; and the entrance to Long Island Sound defended, its waters kept inviolate by ships of war and other means to be found at a navy-yard, the vast commerce, estimated by millions, and thousands of persons daily passing over this inland sea, its coasts, towns, villages, and cities, including Stonington, New London, Norwich, Middletown, Hartford, New Haven, Bridgeport, and the great cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, would be forever secure from the approach of a hostile fleet from the East; thus, in the language of the Committee on Naval Affairs, before quoted, "raising the question to one of national importance and necessity."

Major-General McClellan, Generals Dix, Totten, Barnard, and Macomb, and Colonel Gates, all of whom stand in the first rank as military engineers, have united in declaring that "no harbor in the United States is more susceptible of defense than that of New London."

Before closing my remarks I must call the attention of the committee to the emphatic declarations of two distinguished gentlemen who have, within the last ten years, successively filled the office of Secretary of the Navy, and whose official position gave them excellent opportunities to judge of the superior advantages that this site possesses for a leading navy-yard and naval depot. I first cite the opinion of the very distinguished member of this House from the State of New Jersey, expressed in his annual report to Congress when Secretary of the Navy, made in 1872, and a more intelligent and impartial witness I certainly could not bring before this body to testify in support of my claim that Congress is bound in honor to do justice to Connecticut:

> I have heretofore spoken of the claims of the New London station on the liberality of Congress. Some of these are to be found in a good harbor, easy of access from all directions, an industrious and ingenious people, whose labor is skillful and cheap, and a site for the station already acquired through the liberality of the State, to the improvement of which the Government seems to be virtually pledged. It is already a station of convenience to the service, and with moderate expenditure its use could be largely increased. (Secretary Robeson, 1872.)

I will next call ex-Secretary Thompson to the witness stand, and I trust the committee will listen to his testimony:

> As a strategic point it is of great importance to the defense of the city of New York, the commerce of Long Island, and the whole coast of Connecticut. Batteries or monitors could easily prevent an enemy from penetrating the harbor. (Secretary Thompson, 1877.)
> The harbor is very fine and admirably protected, and in reference to both it and the yard I can only invite attention to what was contained in my last annual report. (Secretary Thompson, 1879.)

That Secretary Thompson fully appreciated the value of this naval station, realized the importance of continuing the work there, and recognized the paramount obligations of the Government to the State of Connecticut to preserve and improve the same, is shown by a letter he addressed to Hon. Mr. ATKINS, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in response to one from the committee inquiring as to the amount required for necessary improvements at this yard. I ask the Clerk to read the portions which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 8, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor, in reply to a communication from the Committee on Appropriations, of which you are chairman, to make the following suggestions in reference to the naval station at New London. In 1867 the State of Connecticut, with magnificent liberality, donated to the United States a tract of land situated on the river Thames, near New London, to be held for naval purposes. The acceptance of this grant has an implied agreement on the part of the Government that the necessary steps should be taken within a reasonable time thereafter to develop the property for the use contemplated. With this view appropriations have from time to time been made and expended in order to the building and equipment of a navy-yard at that point.

* * * * * * *

New London has always been regarded as possessing one of the best harbors on the Atlantic coast, and as unsurpassed by any other in the country as a site for a navy-yard. This opinion has been expressed by some of our most distinguished naval officers, and some years ago was concurred in by a board appointed for its examination by the Secretary of the Navy. The station is situated twenty-five miles from the ocean, and about six miles from Long Island Sound. It has a water front of more than a mile in length, with a depth of channel opposite from thirty to forty feet. The depth of water to the ocean is from twenty-seven to thirty feet at the lowest tide. It is not subject to obstructions from ice, and is accessible at all seasons of the year. In the future construction and repair of vessels it will afford great facilities in acquiring skilled labor, with which the vicinity is abundantly supplied. On the score of healthfulness it is not surpassed by any point in the country. These considerations are sufficient, in my opinion, to justify an appropriation of the sum above indicated at the present session of Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. WAIT. When the Navy Department was subsequently seeking for a station on the Atlantic coast as a rendezvous for the training ships, where the hundreds of apprentices on board the same would be away from the corrupting allurements of cities, and the healthfulness of which was unquestioned, the attention of the Department was again called to the New London yard through the Committee on Appropriations, and I beg leave to have the letter read that was then addressed by Secretary Thompson to the chairmain of the committee, Hon. Mr. ATKINS:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 10, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your reference to this Department for examination and report of a resolution of Hon. Mr. WAIT, with a letter addressed by him to you in relation to putting the New London navy-yard in a state of thorough repair and efficiency.

This yard is admirably situated upon the waters of a bay unsurpassed on the coast, in a healthy region of the country, and if put in a state of thorough efficiency would add greatly to the facilities for repairing ships. The waters of the bay are not seriously affected by ice in the winter season, and on this account the Department has considered it a desirable station for the Minnesota—one of the vessels engaged in training boys for the Navy. She is now there, and has been for several months, and important advantages to the boys are expected to be derived from it on account of their removal from injurious influences to which they were likely to be exposed in the harbor of New York.

The question whether this yard shall be put in a condition of "thorough repair and efficiency" is one peculiarly belonging to Congress, and can only be decided by reference to the general policy which may be adopted in regard to the future building of ships for the Navy, and the sufficiency of the present completed yards for that purpose. There are now there two brick storehouses, each 100 by 40 feet, two stories high, the lower story of one of which is used as a drill-room for the boys on the Minnesota. As the floor of this building is concrete, much inconvenience is complained of on account of the dust raised while the drill is going on, and if its use for that purpose is continued a plank floor will be required to replace the one now there. But as a possible point for permanent use by training ships it is well to consider whether it would not be better to improve the yard with reference to that fact. If this shall be considered expedient, a storehouse 65 by 275 feet should be built. Such a building is supposed by the commandant to be required for immediate use in view of the necessities of the training service. If erected, this building can be partitioned off so as to provide storage for all material of the different bureaus, and at one end shop-rooms for minor repairs of ships and machinery can be erected, space for drilling under cover and for rigging lofts can be provided, and it will also provide a place for the accommodation of the sick. It is estimated that such a building will cost $100,000. There is also needed a bathing and swimming house, with steam for heating and pumping, bath tubs, &c.

Such a building, 20 by 40 feet, with the necessary fixtures, will cost $10,000. Besides the foregoing, there is a shed for spars and boats required, 40 by 150 feet, at a cost of $1,000. The commandant has no house, as in the cases of other yards, and it is desirable that one shall be erected for his use. It can be done for $10,000. For grading the grounds the sum of $5,000 is needed, and $10,000 for repairs of the wharves and the buildings already erected.

The above may be summed up as follows:

Building 65 by 275 feet	$100,000
Bathing and swimming house	10,000
Spar and boat house	1,000
Commandant's house	10,000
Grading grounds	5,000
Repairs of wharves and buildings	10,000
Total	136,000

I am, very respectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

The superior advantages for an important naval station that the site upon the Thames presents has not only been made the subject of examination and recommendation by the prominent naval authorities whose opinions I have already cited, but Rear-Admiral Nichols, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, emphatically recognized the same in his report, made through the Secretary of the Navy, to Congress in December last. I will read a brief extract from this report:

NAVAL STATION, NEW LONDON, CONNECTICUT.

On a recent visit to this station I was strongly impressed with its advantages as a site for an important naval station. Situated on the left bank of the Thames River, five or six miles from its mouth, with deep water along its entire front, the ground sloping back from the river's edge, a dry, gravelly soil, interspersed with the best of granite for building purposes, it seems to possess all the advantages for the making of a first-class yard.

* * * * * * * *

Whatever use is to be made of this property, it is manifest that its entire length should be faced with a quay-wall in eighteen to twenty feet of water, and this should be the first work undertaken, not only for the protection of the shore but for the formation of a space in which to deposit the material which must be removed from the surface in establishing building sites. I have asked for an appropriation for the commencement of this work, and I think it would be a wise measure to appropriate $200,000 annually to carry it to completion.

In connection with this station it will be well to look to the possibilities of the future. The property comprised in the two navy-yards at New York and Boston is year by year becoming more and more valuable for commercial purposes. Pressure has been brought to bear upon the Government to force a relinquishment of these properties. It is not unreasonable to suppose that, under the fostering care of Congress, our shipping and commercial interests will be greatly enlarged, and the demand for wharf and warehouse room at these two important cities will be so great that the pressure upon the Government may not be resisted. Situated nearly midway between these two sea-ports, and with every advantage for creating a first-class yard, would it not be the part of wisdom to recognize the possibilities, and commence the work that will eventually make of New London the leading navy-yard of the country?

All that the people of Connecticut at this time ask is that Congress will stand by the terms of the agreement made by and between the State authorities and the General Government when Connecticut donated this site on the Thames to the United States. As Secretary Robeson declared in 1872, this valuable property was acquired through the liberality of that State, and to its continued improvement

THE GOVERNMENT IS VIRTUALLY PLEDGED.

I trust that this House will not now so legislate as to violate the plighted faith of the nation. I do not ask for an appropriation to construct the buildings named in the letter of ex-Secretary Thompson, which has been read, but for a sum which is at this time required to prevent this yard from being permanently impaired. If I have been correctly informed the sub-committee that had this matter under consideration favored an appropriation of $75,000 to commence the work proposed. That sum, judiciously expended, will save the river front from being washed away and the depth of the channel abutting on the same diminished. In the light of all the facts now presented Congress cannot refuse to make the small appropriation that intelligent and scientific men assert to be absolutely necessary to prevent this public property from going to decay.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

JACKSONVILLE AND KEY WEST RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 6577) granting the right of way to the Jacksonville, Tampa and Key West Railroad Company through the military reservation at Tampa, Florida; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ABERDEEN, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. MULDROW, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6720) to provide for the erection of a public building at Aberdeen, Mississippi, for use as a post-office, United States court, and for United States internal-revenue officials, and for other Government purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT, HAVERSTRAW, NEW YORK.

Mr. BEACH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6721) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to Edward Pye Post No. 179 of the Grand Army of the Republic four condemned cast-iron cannon and four cannon-balls, for decorating the proposed soldiers' monument at Haverstraw, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HALL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. MOSGROVE, indefinitely, on account of ill health.

To Mr. STOCKSLAGER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House duplicate copies of the Territorial laws of Washington Territory; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories.

And then, on motion of Mr. HISCOCK, (at six o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, memorial, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BINGHAM: The petition of the auxiliary corps of letter-carriers of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for an increase of pay—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of the board of health of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for the continuance of the bulletins of the National Board of Health—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. BLANCHARD: The petition of Mrs. Amire Hertzog, for compensation for property destroyed by the United States Army during the war of the rebellion—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DAVIDSON: The petition of citizens of Calhoun and Washington Counties, Florida, for the establishment of a mail-route from Wewahitchka to Saint Andrew's Bay, in the State of Florida—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. FISHER: The petition of Joseph Beers, for compensation for services rendered during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McKINLEY: The petition of William Bramnin and 40 others, of J. T. McKelvy and 29 others, of John Conely and 56 others, of W. W. Pickford and 67 others, and of H. J. Fraser and others, citizens of Ohio, for the passage of the McKinley bill fixing the rates of duty on manufactures of iron, steel, &c.—severally to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Memorial of the board of health of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, urging an appropriation in the sundry civil appropriation bill for continuing the publication of the Bulletin of the National Board of Health—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. C. G. WILLIAMS: The letter of the Secretary of State, recommending that A. S. Stream, keeper of the life-boat station at Shoalwater Bay, Washington Territory, be allowed to accept a medal which the British Government awarded him in recognition of the services rendered to the shipwrecked crew of the Lammerlow, of Liverpool, on the 30th of October, 1881—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 7, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

POTOMAC FLATS—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article in the local columns of the Washington Post of this morning, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the article.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

THE POTOMAC FLATS.

It was rumored at the Capitol yesterday that in consequence of dissatisfaction having been expressed concerning the result of the special committee on the Potomac flats another investigation was to be ordered. It was claimed by those alleged to have all the facts in their possession that the greater portion of the $12,000 appropriated for the committee to sit during the recess to consider the best means of improving the river flats was outrageously squandered. As far as known up to date no report as to the expenditure of this money has ever been made to the Senate, and it is said that unless some statement is shortly forthcoming another investigation will be ordered.

Mr. RANSOM. I now ask the Secretary to read his own letter to me, written to-day, in reference to the expenses of the committee.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE, FINANCIAL ROOM,
Washington, July 7, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry concerning the expenses of the select committee appointed under resolutions of May 9, 1881, and of December 13, 1881, to investigate the condition of the Potomac flats in front of the city of Washington, from the date of the original resolution creating said committee, I submit the following statement of expenses, as shown by the books in this office:

Expenses of members of the committee attending three meetings during the recess of Congress	$234 95
Expenses of deputy sergeant-at-arms, summoning witnesses to appear before the committee	36 50
Expenses of witnesses summoned and examined by the committee	120 00
Expenses of reporting proceedings and evidence	249 95
Hire of clerk	1,188 00
	1,829 50

Respectfully,

F. E. SHOBER, Acting Secretary.

Hon. M. W. RANSOM,
Chairman, &c., United States Senate Chamber.

Mr. RANSOM. By this it will be seen that there is no foundation whatever for the statement in the Post.

Mr. VEST. As a member of that committee I want to make a statement more personal to the chairman of the committee than to myself.

In justice to the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, I will state that so far from his having been a party or accessory in any way to the grievance of which the newspapers of this city now complain, that is, that the appropriation for the Potomac flats has not been placed upon the river and harbor bill, he has urged such an amendment in the Committee on Commerce, of which we are both members, and he came to me yesterday as a member of that committee and of the Senate and personally requested that I should give in my adherence to that amendment.

I opposed the amendment in committee, I am frank to say, for the reason that I believed it was not germane to the river and harbor bill; that it was not a commercial improvement, and should not be placed upon that bill, while at the same time I am in favor of improving the Potomac flats, and have always been in favor of it, and am to-day.

Let me say another word. In an evening paper here yesterday evening was the atrocious charge that the amendment had not been placed on the river and harbor bill because the members of the sub-committee, or the Committee on Commerce rather, were influenced by improper motives in regard to some company that they say is connected with the flats. I never heard of such a company before, or if I did it made so little impression that it passed from my mind. I have never been approached by any human being on this question, except by citizens of Washington who were urging the improvement.

One thing further. Three members of the sub-committee, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN,] and the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] are all owners of valuable real estate in the city of Washington. They have their residences here, and they are directly interested aside from their official duties in the improvement of this city.

In conclusion, I care nothing about these statements myself, but I have just this to say: I congratulate the people of Washington City upon the ability displayed by these most astute and intelligent editors in making friends in the last few days for the Potomac improvement. If they continue their able and eloquent efforts upon paper, their persuasive eloquence, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] suggests, it is safe to say that the friends of the Potomac flats improvement will become smaller and beautifully less.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of Friberg & Workum, the Boone County Distillery Company, and 35 other firms in Ohio and Kentucky, praying for the passage of a bill for the extension of time on bonded whiskies for a period of five years from the date of original entry of deposit in distillery warehouse; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. I present the petition of John Gibson, Son & Company, of Philadelphia, and various other holders of spirituous liquors, praying that they may have an extension of time for two years on the amount of spirits that they now have, and that all spirits manufactured hereafter shall be three years in bonded warehouse. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS presented additional evidence to accompany the bill (S. No. 909) to correct the military record of William S. Smith, of Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented a petition of citizens of the city of Washington, praying to be indemnified for damage done to their property on the line of F street west of the new State, War, and Navy Department building, by work done under the direction of the late Board of Public Works; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SIXTH NORTH CAROLINA COLLECTION DISTRICT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. VANCE, from the select committee to examine into the collection of internal revenue in the sixth district of North Carolina, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the proceedings of the select committee to investigate the sixth collection district of North Carolina, be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. No. 1095) to provide for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. S. SHALLENBERGER of Pennsylvania, Mr. J. HYATT SMITH of New York, and Mr. J. W. SINGLETON of Illinois, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2125) for the relief of Thomas J. Prosise; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2126) for the payment of certain awards in favor of parties therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2127) to retire enlisted men in the regular and volunteer Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERRY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2128) for the relief of Mrs. Catherine E. Whitall; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2129) to punish postmasters for making false certificates of the arrivals and departures of mails; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2130) to provide for the irrigation of Snake River Valley, in the Territory of Idaho, and to promote the settlement thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2131) to repeal all laws and parts of laws granting public lands to the State of Missouri to aid in the construction and extension of the Iron Mountain Railroad, or the Saint Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad, from Pilot Knob, in the State of Missouri, to the southern boundary line of said State, and to declare such lands forfeited to the United States, and to relieve said Saint Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad from any duty or obligation imposed by any acts making said grants of transporting the property, troops, or mails of the Government of the United States free of toll or other charges, or at rates below those charged for commercial traffic; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. ROLLINS. Yesterday morning I reported adversely from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (H. R. No. 6626) to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. It has come to the knowledge of the committee that parties interested desire to be heard in regard to the bill. I ask therefore that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order indefinitely postponing the bill will be reconsidered by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be reported.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The amendment to the amendment is to strike out all after the word "surveys," in line 1091, to the end of the paragraph, in line 1097, and to insert:

And that the annual cost of the maintenance of said canal when completed shall be estimated for and accompany the report of the said survey.

Then retain all from and including lines 1098 to 1107; then strike out all after the word "commenced," in line 1107, to line 1193, inclusive; and in line 1194 to insert, after the word "dollars," "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope that the Senate understands the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not know that I understand exactly what the amendment to the amendment means. I presume the Senator from South Carolina will explain his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. The amendment that I offered yesterday evening is to strike out in the first paragraph of the amendment of the Committee on Commerce on page 45, after the word "surveys," in line 1091, to the end of the paragraph, and insert the following in lieu of what is stricken out:

And that the annual cost of the maintenance of said canal when completed shall be estimated for and accompany the report of the said survey.

Then retain, from line 1098 to line 1107, inclusive; then strike out from line 1108, down to and including line 1193.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the amendment were adopted the measure would provide for a survey.

Mr. BUTLER. To survey and to lay out the canal. I also move to strike out the words "and construct," in line 1075. The practical effect of my amendment is to provide for an ample survey and give $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress the report of the engineer.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But the Senator's amendment does not provide for the construction of a canal.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir. That is the only difference between my amendment and that of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understand it.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina why he desires a new survey?

Mr. BUTLER. For the very simple reason that there has not been a satisfactory survey.

Mr. LOGAN. There has been a satisfactory one. There have been three surveys of the work by the best engineers of the country reported to the War Department, and transmitted to Congress, with the estimate of the cost, the length, depth, width, and everything.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will be good enough to explain just exactly what those surveys are he will do more than any other Senator on this floor has done. There is certainly a conflict in the reports of the engineers, and I think when the Senator comes to investigate the matter he will find himself that there has not been such a survey as would justify this appropriation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Those three surveys were referred to yesterday. If the Senator from Illinois has them before him, he will see exactly what they were. One was a survey for a ship-canal, a very extensive work; another was for a much smaller canal, and another was a partial survey of a portion of the proposed work.

Mr. LOGAN. Were the reports read?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The substance of them was stated.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state further that there is no estimate as to what will be the cost of the maintenance of this canal, and it seems to me to be a very important element of the work. Those reports were all read yesterday.

Mr. LOGAN. If the reports were read, of course it is not necessary to read them again. One survey was made in 1871 by Gorham P. Low, a civil engineer. Was that report read?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from South Carolina does not pretend that that was an estimate for a ship-canal?

Mr. BUTLER. The one of 1875 was.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will find by an examination of these reports that there were two estimates, one for a ship-canal and one for an ordinary commercial canal, commonly so called; that the estimate for the ship-canal amounted to some eleven million dollars, and the one for the ordinary canal, as is proposed by this amendment to the bill, amounted to a little over three million dollars. One estimate was four million dollars and something, and another three million dollars and something.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not mistaken.

Mr. BUTLER. One was for $12,000,000 and the other for $3,900,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I know what I am talking about. I have the estimates right here.

Mr. BUTLER. There is a difference in the reports; that is all.

Mr. LOGAN. The estimates were made by J. H. Wilson, Lieutenant Colonel Thirty-fifth Infantry, and Brevet Major General United States Army, who belonged to the Engineer Corps, and William Gooding, a United States civil engineer; and the estimates made by those persons were based on the estimates made by Low and Macomb for a ship-canal, $18,217,242.56. This is the language of the estimate of Wilson and Gooding:

For a canal sixty feet wide and six feet deep, the cost, together with that of the feeder, has been estimated at $4,600,000, and it would not probably exceed that sum, while it would secure a cheap and direct navigation to the lakes, and a choice of markets to all the country drained by the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries.

Afterward estimating the Illinois and Michigan Canal in connection with these others, for a ship-canal running through, the estimate was $18,000,000 and over, but for the purpose of making a canal as is proposed here their estimate was that the cost would not exceed $4,600,000. The report goes on to recommend an appropriation to the amount above stated. The report says:

The importance of the improvement which we have surveyed and estimated is greatly enhanced by the fact that surveys have demonstrated the entire practicability of a canal from the Illinois River, at or near the mouth of the Bureau, to the Mississippi, at or near Rock Island. The length of the canal would be about sixty-four miles, and it would be supplied with water by a navigable feeder, thirty-eight miles in length, from Rock River at Dixon.

That is the survey precisely that is proposed in the amendment. It was made three times. The last estimate was made by Colonel Wilson, based on these others, by an actual survey.

I noticed in the remarks made here yesterday a good deal was based on the idea that the survey was for a ship-canal much wider than the proposition here, and it was suggested that a great expense would be attached to it by reason of the condemnation of property along the line for that purpose. I do not know whether an estimate was given here yesterday or not as to the cost of that. If not, I have it myself. The length of canal and feeder is in miles 103, which at 320 rods to the mile, makes the length of the canal and feeder in rods 32,960. If you make the width of the right of way 12 rods, it will require 395,520 rods, or 2,472 acres, of land for the right of way. That is the amount of land it will take if the Government has to pay for every foot of it. You may estimate that land at the highest possible price, $60 per acre. My opinion is the land can be procured at a much less rate, but estimate the whole length at $60 per acre, and it would be for the right of way $148,380, which is doubtless a very liberal estimate so far as the cost of the land is concerned; and $148,380 is a mere bagatelle so far as the expense of procuring the right of way is concerned.

In reference to the cost of keeping up the canal, the Senator from South Carolina objects, because he says there is no estimate for that. If you will take the Illinois and Michigan Canal as any data whatever you will find by a report made of the expense of that canal and the profits arising therefrom, you will find by parity of reasoning that the expenses of keeping up this canal will be a mere bagatelle and the profits will be very great. I have reports up to the year 1877, when the Illinois and Michigan Canal was not nearly so profitable as it is now. That canal runs from Chicago and empties into the Illinois River not very far from where this canal is proposed at Hennepin. I will go back as far as 1866:

The gross tolls of the Illinois and Michigan Canal for the year 1866 were $302,000. Deducting all expenses and funds for repairs the canal has yielded, under all disadvantages, an average net income for ten years past of $157,000.

So that, as I stated, by parity of reasoning, when this canal is finished the expense will be a mere nothing while the profits will be very much beyond the expenses.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that no profits will be derived from this canal; that it is to be free.

Mr. LOGAN. But I am speaking of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. It belongs to the State of Illinois to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is not speaking of the proposed Hennepin Canal?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. As the Senator spoke of the amount that would be required to keep up the canal, I only say that there is no way to estimate that except to take a canal that is already in operation and see the expense attached to that; and I take the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which is certainly as expensive a canal, if not more so, than the Hennepin Canal would be. As I said, the profits in 1866 were $302,000, (I do not remember what they are now, but they are much more,) and the net profits were $157,000 at that time.

Mr. BUTLER. The excess would be about $150,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, for that canal, and it is a smaller canal so far as expense is concerned than the one now proposed.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the Senator know what number of locks are on the Illinois and Michigan Canal he speaks of, because I should think the expense of maintaining it would depend very largely upon that.

Mr. LOGAN. I will show the Senator after awhile what it is. The State of Illinois improved the Illinois River before it was turned over to the Government. The Illinois and Michigan Canal connects the lakes with the Illinois River. On the Illinois River the locks, dams, and all cost about half a million dollars. As a matter of course I cannot tell what the locks and dams would cost on this proposed canal, because they are included in the grand total. The grand estimate is made at $3,000,000 and something over.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Iowa yesterday stated the number of locks. I forget the number.

Mr. ALLISON. Twenty-one.

Mr. LOGAN. They are included in the grand total.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, but the point of my inquiry is as to the expense of maintaining them and keeping them up. I do not know much about such matters, but I suppose it would be more expensive to keep up a canal with a large number of locks than one with a fewer number. That is the point.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose that is very true; I do not doubt it; but if the locks and dams are properly constructed there is very little expense attached to keeping them up. The expense of keeping up a canal is not very great any way, if the canal runs through a country where it can be properly constructed. As a matter of course, I am not an engineer officer; I have made no estimate of the expense.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not making it as a point of objection. I do not desire to be understood as objecting to this enterprise at all; I am not objecting to it, but I simply want to get that information which it seems to me is so important in order to vote intelligently upon the question. I am not objecting to the amendment. I think if my amendment to it were adopted we could have a survey with a full report by next December, and there would not be the slightest difficulty about it. That is my judgment.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as that is concerned, there never can be any better survey made than has been done.

Mr. BUTLER. There seems to be very great difference of opinion about this matter.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know of any difference of opinion in regard to the survey among the friends of the measure. I do not know of any man who says that the survey which has been made is not a competent survey, or that all three different surveys which have been made are not competent. There have been surveys made for a ship-canal, and surveys made for a commercial canal.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to direct the Senator's attention to one fact in the amendment. The amendment provides for a canal seventy feet wide and six feet deep. The estimate to which the Senator refers was based upon a canal sixty feet wide and seven feet deep. There is a very great disparity at once between what is proposed by the amendment and what was suggested in the report of the engineers. As for the cost of the work, there is that difference, which is a very material one, to begin with.

Mr. LOGAN. The canal is to be seventy feet wide.

Mr. BUTLER. That is contemplated in the amendment, and the estimate was made for a canal sixty feet wide.

Mr. ALLISON. That only increases the cost $200,000.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know. None of us can tell.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me say a word on that subject.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Colonel Macomb made an estimate for thirty-feet locks instead of twenty-one-feet locks, and said the additional cost of thirty-feet locks would be only $641,000. If you have thirty-feet locks you must have a wider canal than sixty feet, so it is perfectly demonstrable that there can be no great additional expense by widening the canal.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as additional expense is concerned, if you make it according to the estimate that was made, considering it to be a continuation of a ship-canal, then it would not cost the amount of money the Senator understands it would cost. The estimate for the ship-canal the whole length, sixty miles, was but $18,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, $18,217,242.56 was the estimate for making a ship-canal the whole way from Chicago to the Mississippi River, but the estimate for making a ship-canal sixty miles long with twenty-eight, or call it thirty miles of a feeder from the Rock River at Dixon, the whole estimate to make it a ship-canal, including locks, dams, and everything, was not over $11,000,000.

Mr. BUTLER. I call the Senator's attention to another thing in this amendment, which was not contemplated evidently when the estimate was made. The amendment provides that:

> Said canal and said branch shall not be less than seventy feet wide at the water-line, and not less than six feet in depth of water, with locks not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length and twenty-one feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least two hundred and eighty tons burden.

I confess very frankly that I do not know how many branches are to be built. It contemplates a branch canal.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a feeder. There is but one feeder, and that is from Dixon on the Rock River to the Illinois River. That is the only one estimated for and the only one thought of by anybody. You may call it a branch; it is called a feeder.

Mr. BUTLER. It is called a "branch" in the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. No matter what it is called, that is what it means. You may call it a branch or a feeder.

Mr. McMILLAN. "A branch canal or feeder."

Mr. LOGAN. That is estimated for in the estimates. I did not get up to make any extended remarks; but as the Senator spoke of the feeder I call his attention to the remark of the engineer in the last report made that I was referring to and from which I read a little while ago. Perhaps he did not hear it. Speaking of this improvement the report says:

> The length of the canal would be about sixty-four miles, and it would be supplied with water by a navigable feeder, thirty-eight miles in length, from Rock River at Dixon.

That is what he speaks of as a branch canal and that is estimated for. Take the estimate made by Gorham P. Low, civil engineer, for the same character of canal; take the estimate made by Colonel Wilson, which was a survey from Chicago, a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal in connection with the proposed canal, making the whole of it a ship-canal, and then afterward he put in an estimate for this canal only sixty feet wide, which, as I said, is commonly called a commercial canal. If you read the report of Low on this subject you will find that it gives the objections which are made to the construction of the canal. One was by people who say it would drain Rock River to such an extent as to injure the water-power. He answers that objection, and then says:

> The proposed enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the lock and dam in course of construction in the Illinois River, contemplates the passage of iron-clad gun-boats between the Gulf and the lakes; but since boats suitable for use on the Gulf and lakes would be unfit for the Upper Mississippi, it is inferred that this project is for commercial purposes only. This being the case, a smaller canal would probably be better suited to the situation, both from its reduced cost and the smaller amount of water required by it.
> The facts in relation to the large canal having been brought to your notice, you verbally directed me to report and estimate upon a canal of smaller section. I have, therefore, proposed a canal section 60 feet wide at the water-line and 6 feet deep, and having slopes of 2 to 1, with locks 150 feet in length and 21 feet in width.
> These dimensions correspond to those adopted by J. O. Hudnutt, civil engineer, in his estimates for a canal over nearly the same route, based upon surveys made in the summer of 1866.
>
> The line recommended for this work corresponds nearly with that shown upon the maps for the larger canal, and the elevation of its water-surface and bottom are indicated by broken and dotted lines upon the profile. Upon the main portion the bottom of the channel corresponds with that before proposed, making its water-line 1 foot lower. Composite locks have been estimated for, and in number, location, and lift are similar to those already enumerated. No swing-bridges or inside protecting walls will be necessary. The amount of water required for this canal is estimated as follows: For evaporation and leakage, 1.33 cubic feet per mile per second, or 130 cubic feet per second for canal and feeder; for two hundred lockages in twenty-four hours, 87 cubic feet per second, making a total demand from Rock River at Dixon of 217 cubic feet per second. With a feeder 50 feet wide and 6 feet deep, with slopes of 2 to 1, the sectional area will be 228 square feet, and the velocity required to the above quantity 0.95 feet per second. To obtain this velocity through the above section, it will be necessary to give to the bottom of the feeder an inclination of 0.16 feet to the mile, or 6 feet fall from Dixon to the junction with the main line.
> The eastern division from the Illinois River to the feeder is estimated to cost $1,467,202.44, or $56,736.37 per mile; the western division, from the feeder to the Mississippi, $1,429,708.50, or $36,241.03 per mile; the feeder, $1,002,811.70, or $26,306.71 per mile; making the total for the whole work $3,899,722.64, or $8,579,970.63 less than for the larger canal.
> A tabular detailed statement of this estimate accompanies this report.
> The surveys were made wholly for the purpose of locating a canal 160 feet wide, and the narrower section would probably admit of following the bluffs more closely and thus effect a large saving of earth-work.

The total estimate was made on the idea that the canal was to be one hundred and sixty feet wide.

Mr. BUTLER. That was the $12,000,000 estimate.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir. Then he makes an estimate of the canal when reduced in its proportions, the number of locks, &c., at sixty feet wide; then he speaks of the cost, and makes the total of the whole work $3,899,722.64; or $8,579,970 less than for the larger canal.

> The surveys were made wholly for the purpose of locating a canal one hundred and sixty feet wide, and the narrow section would probably admit of following the bluffs more closely, and thus effect a large saving of earth-work.

Then he makes the estimate of the proposed canal as suggested here, except that the suggestion is seventy feet instead of sixty feet in width. Suppose you take the ten feet added to the sixty feet, consider it one-seventh of the cost of the canal, and take that one seventh and add it to the cost of the canal, and it will not make much over $4,000,000 all told. Consider the cost $3,000,000, or consider it $4,000,000; take the one-seventh of the four million and add it to the four million, and the addition of the ten feet could not be in excess of the one-seventh of the cost of the whole; the canal is not even then an expensive project.

If I had time, which I have not, for I did not intend to even attempt an argument, as the matter was debated yesterday, I would read from a report which I have in my hand to show the amount in different years of the products of that part of the country without taking in the estimate of the amount that would come down the Mississippi River, that naturally would go through this canal to Chicago, and it is perfectly enormous. The value saved to the producers by transporting the products of that country over a water line would astonish any man who would examine the question.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to call his attention to a part of the report which he has already read, of which I ask some explanation from the friends of this measure? I refer to the part of it the Senator can find in the bound volume:

> The most important and costly part of the route across this section of the country is the portion between Hennepin and Chicago, for this part is essential as affording an eastern outlet for the Hennepin Canal traffic, and for perfecting the navigation to Chicago from the Lower Mississippi River through the Illinois River, which is now being improved for steamboat navigation from the Hennepin Basin down to the Mississippi River. Indeed, the Hennepin Canal, without the improvement of the Upper Illinois River and the enlargement of the eastern portion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, would be useless as an outlet for the freights of the Upper Mississippi River.

* * * * * * * *

It will be seen by the report of the assistant engineer that the estimate for the route as above sketched out for a navigable water-way from the Mississippi River, near Rock Island, to Chicago, on Lake Michigan, is $19,780,535; to which should be added the amount of increase in estimate for locks of proper size on Hennepin Canal, $641,284; making a grand total of $20,421,819.

This is the report of Macomb, and I understand this estimate refers to what is called the commercial canal and not the ship-canal. I may be very much mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. VEST. At any rate the assertion of the engineer here is that without the improvement of the eastern end of the route the western end will be perfectly useless.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will understand that prior to this project being attempted as a Government matter, the State of Illinois itself was improving the Illinois River:

The Legislature of the State of Illinois, by an act approved February 28, A. D. 1867, made provision, so far as in the judgment of that body the State could do, for deep-water communication between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, by the improvement of the Illinois River, the enlargement of the existing canal, the extension of the same to the Mississippi River at or above Rock Island, and the improvement of Rock River.

The State of Illinois appropriated money and levied a special tax for that purpose, built locks and dams on the Illinois River, and then the Government of the United States, by the consent of the State of Illinois, took possession of that improvement on the Illinois River and appropriated money for it, and appropriates money every year for it and has it in charge—opening up the Illinois River, passing by Hennepin, where this canal will make a junction with the Illinois River. The Illinois River improvement is so far completed now that commerce can pass up and down to the Illinois and Michigan Canal. It does so to-day and does constantly. It needs improvement as do the various harbors named in the bill, and as do the rivers that are being improved by the Government for the benefit of navigation. The improvement exists, and is to-day a part of the improvement system of the Government of the United States.

The estimate the Senator refers to was made before this improvement was completed, and it was made including the Illinois and Michigan Canal, the widening and deepening of that canal to make it a ship-canal; but the proposition has been changed, not to make a ship-canal from Chicago to Rock Island by way of the Illinois River, but to make what is known as a commercial canal, which avoids the expense of the deepening and widening of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and of its continuation, reducing the estimate very materially.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask a question for information?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the contemplated Hennepin Canal runs from a point on the Mississippi River near Rock Island to the town of Hennepin on the Illinois River?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. That distance is about sixty-five miles, which would have to be excavated?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there water communication between Hennepin and Chicago?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. All the way?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. There is water communication then from Hennepin to Chicago?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. It is part of the system. There are locks and dams on the Illinois River.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there not also a canal from La Salle, on the Illinois River, to Chicago?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this intended to be a continuation of that water-way?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, that is the object of it; and I will state further, for the purpose of making this thing perfectly plain, that I understood when the State of Illinois undertook to improve the Illinois River it was with that view, because the Illinois and Michigan Canal was made by the State itself; it belongs to the State. It undertook to improve the water-way from Chicago to Rock Island by way of the Hennepin Canal, and to commence the improvement of the Illinois River, the Illinois and Michigan Canal having been completed, and it expended large sums of money on the improvement of the Illinois River, and then turned it over to the Government of the United States with the idea of making it a Government work clear through from Chicago to the Mississippi River. Our State constitution prohibits turning over the Illinois and Michigan Canal except by vote of the people, and that proposition is before the people of the State of Illinois to-day, having been submitted by the Legislature.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask one other question?

Mr. LOGAN. I would prefer that the Senator should allow me to finish this point. That proposition is before the people of Illinois to-day, having passed our Legislature at its last session, so that by turning over the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the Government the Government will then have the water-way from Chicago to Rock Island; and this contemplated canal makes connection with the Mississippi River, so that the Government then will have charge of the system from the outlet of Lake Michigan clear through to the Mississippi River, with a view in the future to connecting the lakes together, and running a water-way clear through to the eastern shore somewhere. That is the idea. Whether it will be carried out or not I cannot say; but that is the design of this provision.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to make a suggestion? Living in an adjoining State, I know some little about matters in Illinois, and my understanding is that the constitutional convention of Illinois in 1870 prohibited the State Legislature forever from voting a dollar to the construction of this project, the Hennepin Canal. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that I can quote the provision verbatim, but this is it——

Mr. VEST. I have the provision here.

Mr. LOGAN. It is the last section of the constitution of the State of Illinois, referring to the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which deprives the Legislature of Illinois of the power of transferring or assigning it except by a vote of the people.

Mr. VEST. As I understand further the meaning of that constitutional amendment, it took away from the Legislature of Illinois absolutely the power to make any appropriation for the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; it applies to all railways and canals.

Mr. VEST. The debates of the convention, which are perfectly accessible, show that this very question was up, and that was the salient point in that discussion. It has been considered settled since that time that the State of Illinois had nothing further to do with it.

I do not want to take the Senator off the floor by occupying his time, but if I understand the Senator from Illinois, after that time the General Government took control of the improvement upon the Illinois River. The report from which I read is dated in 1875, five years after that, and in that report Macomb uses this language:

Indeed, the Hennepin Canal, without the improvement of the Upper Illinois River and the enlargement of the eastern portion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, would be useless as an outlet for the freights of the Upper Mississippi River.

So that the General Government had then practical control of this work.

Mr. LOGAN. It had control of the Illinois River.

Mr. VEST. Exactly; and that is the point I make, that under the report of Colonel Macomb in 1875, five years after the General Government took control, it would require then $20,000,000 in order to make this work effective at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. VEST. That is the report. Here it is.

Mr. LOGAN. That report is based upon the idea of making a ship-canal from Chicago to the Mississippi River.

Mr. VEST. This is the commercial canal.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have it here, too, the report of Hudnutt and Low, on which all these reports have been based, and the estimate was then $12,479,000. Afterward the report of Wilson estimated, including the whole canal from Chicago, eighteen million dollars and something over. Of course there was a slight difference in their estimates, but that included the whole water-way from Chicago to the Mississippi River, and not merely the Hennepin Canal, and that water-way was in contemplation as a ship-canal one hundred and sixty feet wide.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator will find out when he gets the letter of Colonel Macomb transmitting the report of Mr. Low that he does not concur in the opinion expressed by Mr. Low. I think he will find that to be the fact. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] stated that fact yesterday. I understand that Colonel Macomb does not concur in the estimates made by the civil engineer, Low. The Senator from Connecticut stated yesterday, and I think read from his letter of transmission, that he could not concur.

Mr. HAWLEY. He transmits it without a word of comment one way or the other except on the one single matter pertaining to land damages. He says the engineer is mistaken about the people giving the land for nothing, but the rest of it is transmitted without a word either of approval or disapproval.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will read Macomb's letter:

ROCK ISLAND, ILLINOIS, May 15, 1871.

Is that the letter the Senator speaks of?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. VEST. The report of 1875.

Mr. LOGAN. This is the letter transmitting the report of Low:

ROCK ISLAND, ILLINOIS, May 15, 1871.

GENERAL: I send to you to-day by express a box containing the maps and report of Mr. Gorham P. Low, jr., civil engineer, assistant in charge of the survey for a ship-canal from Hennepin, on the Illinois River, to Watertown, on the Mississippi River, some eight miles above here, showing a length for the canal some sixty-five miles and a feeder some thirty-eight miles. This report was completed by Mr. Low and presented at my office during my absence on a tour of duty to Phœnixville, or it should have been forwarded at an earlier day.

I cannot say that I agree with Mr. Low in the conclusion that, in case of the construction of the canal, "the counties and cities immediately benefited by the work would relieve the Government from any expenditure for damages," but the great cost of the ship-canal will probably prevent the Government from immediately undertaking the work, especially in view of the good water communication between the lakes and the Mississippi by the Illinois River improvement now in progress. That part of the report giving estimates for a commercial canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River will be of interest to the canal commissioners of the State of Illinois and to that part of the community whose interests would be promoted by such a line of communication; and as the ship-canal survey afforded the data for such an estimate, I authorized it to be appended to the report upon the ship-canal survey.

The box now sent by express contains the following papers: Mr. Low's manuscript report to me, twenty-two pages, and the tabular statements, and six sheets of maps mentioned in the report.

All of which is respectfully submitted by your most obedient servant,

J. N. MACOMB,
Colonel of Engineers, United States Army.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

That shows that Colonel Macomb disagreed with Mr. Low in this, that the people on the route would not save the Government from expense by donating the land. That was the first proposition in which he disagreed with Low. The next proposition he disagreed with him in was as to making it a ship-canal; but you do not find anywhere in this letter that he disagreed with the estimate of Mr. Low for making it a commercial canal.

Mr. BUTLER. If I heard the letter correctly, there is not anything in it commending the estimates of Mr. Low as to the commercial canal.

Mr. LOGAN. I will read, and let us see:

That part of the report giving estimates for a commercial canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River will be of interest to the canal commissioners of the State of Illinois—

That was at the time they themselves were trying to make this improvement. Hence he says it will be of interest to them—and to that part of the community whose interests would be promoted by such a line of communication; and as the ship-canal survey afforded the data for such an estimate I authorized it to be appended to the report upon the ship-canal survey.

There is not a word in opposition to that.

Mr. BUTLER. Colonel Macomb does not concur in it. That is the point.

Mr. LOGAN. The Government had nothing to do with it at that time. Colonel Macomb says it is of interest to the canal commissioners of Illinois, because the State of Illinois was then engaged in this project; and hence he authorized this report to be made and appended for the benefit of the canal commissioners of Illinois, who had the thing under their charge.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will allow me to remind him that it was the year before that that the State of Illinois had by her constitution absolutely prohibited the State from loaning its credit to this identical canal in any way. That was in the year 1870. This report was in 1871.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, suppose the people of Illinois had done so, does that interfere with the report that was made? We are now attempting to do a thing that Illinois cannot do, and we are now calling attention to this report in reference to the question whether this is proper; not as to whether Illinois can do it, for that is not the question. If Illinois could do it, probably she would not ask Congress to do it; but inasmuch as she cannot do it, this report is just as good if Illinois cannot do it as it would be if Illinois could build the canal. What effect has that on the report? The report presents the question for the Government of the United States to consider at this time, and it is not a question as to whether Illinois has the power to make the canal or not.

Mr. BUTLER. There is one other element entering into this question which I think ought to be considered by the Senate. That report was made eleven years ago. There may have been a great many changes in the conditions on which the estimate was made; labor may be higher, and there may be a thousand other things entering into an estimate which it would be very important for us to have. I say to the Senator from Illinois with perfect frankness that I concur in all he says as to the importance of having this water-way opened and I expect to support it most cheerfully when I see the proper foundation laid, and I am extremely anxious to do it.

The Senator asks me what is the necessity for having another survey? This very amendment, part of which I propose to retain, beginning in line 1098, directs the Secretary of War to "cause to be made, by skillful engineers of the Army, all necessary examinations and surveys, and from them and surveys already made he shall determine and locate the route of said canal." I submit that if there had been a satisfactory survey already, one upon which a business man would undertake to make a contract, it would be quite unnecessary to have that language in this amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. In reference to a satisfactory survey, I would ask the Senator whether any person belonging to the Engineer Corps, whether any man informed in the State of Illinois, whether any man informed in the State of Iowa, or in any of those States that are interested in this matter, has objected to the survey heretofore made? Has any one said it did not run on the right route? Everybody is satisfied with the survey, for the reason that it was made on the best location where the canal can be made; it avoids the towns and all the places where the Government would be involved in great expense; it goes around the ridge of the hills, where a canal can be made the cheapest. If the line were to be surveyed a thousand times it would be made, in my judgment, over the very location where it is located now. You find nobody who ever investigated the question who objects to the survey. That is not the question and never has been. It is not the question in the Engineer Department or anywhere else as to whether the survey is a correct one or not. Nobody has ever questioned that.

The Senator from Missouri said that this estimate was made by Macomb for the commercial canal. He will find by referring to Macomb's own letter that he is mistaken in that, because Macomb says he sends the estimate for a ship-canal, and appends the estimate for the commercial canal to it, thinking it would be of interest to the canal commissioners of Illinois, showing that he does not at all give his estimate for the commercial canal, but does it for the ship-canal from Chicago to Rock Island.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the distance from Hennepin to Chicago?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember now.

Mr. ALLISON. Ninety-two miles from Chicago to La Salle and nineteen from La Salle to Hennepin.

Mr. LOGAN. I think that is the exact distance.

Mr. BUTLER. About one hundred and ten miles. Does the Senator know what that canal cost?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know now.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it cost about $6,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Over six millions.

Mr. BUTLER. Six and a half million dollars, I see by the figures in one of the reports. Is that canal the size it is proposed to make this canal, or is it smaller or larger?

Mr. LOGAN. We propose that that canal shall be widened so as to be on a par with this canal. It is wide enough to be used, and is used all the time.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand, then, that the estimate of three or four million dollars which Mr. Low makes does not include the expense of widening and enlarging the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly not; it only includes the Hennepin Canal. If the Government of the United States would take the Illinois and Michigan Canal and widen that canal, it would be of more benefit to the people of the Northwest than anything the Government can do almost in this connection.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a question for the Government hereafter whether it will widen that canal or not. I have no doubt they will.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to prolong this debate, but in response to a suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina I wish to read from Mr. Doran's report of 1875, not 1870. I merely mention the date of the report to show what his view was at that time:

The surveys that have already been made of the principal part of this route render it possible to begin the location and actual construction of the work at as early a day as may be convenient to the authorities in charge.

He states that the survey is in such condition and the location in such condition that the work can be begun——

Mr. HAWLEY. Is he not referring to the larger canal, the $10,000,000 canal?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir. I will read:

Third division.—November 14 I received an order to resurvey a part of the western division of the Hennepin-Canal route, and to examine the country lying between the Rock and the Mississippi Rivers.

He makes that statement relative to the Hennepin Canal; he makes that statement with reference to the condition of the work; and Colonel Macomb, in transmitting that report, speaks in the highest manner of this portion of the work. In it he alludes to what the Senator from Missouri has referred with regard to the cost of enlarging the Illinois and Michigan Canal in order to make it equal to the dimensions of the canal proposed between Hennepin and the Mississippi River. But since that time a great deal of work has been done in the way of improving the Illinois River below La Salle and above Hennepin, both by the General Government and by the State of Illinois. The State of Illinois regarded this very work as so important that she expended $450,000 of State funds to build a single lock on the Illinois River, and I think that is the identical lock at Hennepin which will be transferred absolutely by the recent act of the Illinois Legislature referred to by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. VEST. And yet the State of Illinois, which considers this work so important—I presume the Senator from Iowa refers to the whole Hennepin-Canal project—in 1870 adopted the following amendment to her constitution:

The General Assembly shall never loan the credit of the State or make appropriations from the treasury thereof in aid of railroads or canals: Provided, That any surplus earnings of any canal may be appropriated for its enlargement or extension.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me call attention to the fact right there that in that same constitution they prohibited the Legislature of Illinois from ever transferring that canal to private parties or to any authority without a vote of the people, showing that they regarded the Illinois and Michigan Canal as the most valuable improvement in that State.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is true that the people of Illinois prohibited the Legislature from transferring the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which had cost the people of Illinois six million and odd thousand dollars. I read the provision from the reports of the constitutional convention of Illinois:

> The Illinois and Michigan Canal shall never be sold or leased until the specific proposition for the sale or lease thereof shall first have been submitted to a vote of the people of the State, at a general election, and have been approved by a majority of all the votes polled at such election.

In other words, the constitutional convention, by a vote of nearly 5 to 1—47 to 11—said to all subsequent Legislatures: You shall never pass away the title to the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which has cost us six and a quarter million dollars, but you shall never give a dollar to the construction of the Hennepin Canal, which was an extension of the Illinois and Michigan Canal from the Illinois River to the Mississippi River. Now, if the Senator from Iowa is correct in his eloquent declamation yesterday and to-day as to the inestimable value of this great improvement, there are no people that know better its inestimable value than the people of Illinois, because it is exclusively within the territorial domains of that great State; and yet deliberately, by a vote of nearly 5 to 1, the people of Illinois said: We want no more canals; you shall not give the assent of the Legislature, or a single dollar——

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the Senator infer from the fact that a State has adopted as one of its constitutional provisions a prohibition against the loan of its State credit for building railroads and canals, or other public improvements, therefore it is opposed to the construction of those improvements? That provision is one of the most wholesome ones that can be embraced in a State constitution, and you will find it in the constitutions of most of the other Western States; but to argue that that was an objection to the construction of the Hennepin Canal is a very far-fetched argument, it seems to me.

Mr. VEST. The far-fetchedness is on the other side of the question. It is far-fetched when it is in the channel of the Commerce Committee; but the gentlemen who advocate this project tell us that it is of overpowering importance; that it is of such inestimable value, when the constitutional convention of Illinois directly and absolutely prohibited one dollar from being given by the State to the construction of this canal, although it had given six and a quarter million dollars to the construction of another. It shows that they were satisfied with the canal system——

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to ask a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator what argument he draws from that statement? Would the State of Missouri, for example, be willing that the credit of that State should be loaned to obtain a million dollars for the improvement of the Missouri River, which is found in this bill? Would they not say that should not be done? Why? Because the improvement of the Missouri River is not a local thing; it is a thing that pertains to a great region of country outside the State of Missouri. So as to this canal.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, permit me to ask the Senator from Iowa if the people of Illinois believed that the construction of these canals was a national matter, why did they expend six and a quarter million dollars in the construction of the Illinois and Michigan Canal?

Mr. LOGAN. I think I can answer that if the Senator will allow me, when he takes his seat.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course I desire nothing but information in regard to it; but here the people of Illinois, after constructing a canal at an expense of six and a quarter million dollars, should then put in this constitutional provision with direct allusion and reference to the Hennepin Canal itself, because the debates of the convention show that the Hennepin Canal was under discussion, and, as I said before, was the salient point in this whole matter. Illinois had tried one canal at a cost of over $6,000,000, and then the question was, should she build another, and the very arguments in totidem verbis which we have heard here from the Senator from Iowa yesterday and the Senator from Illinois to-day were used in the convention, that it was necessary to give an outlet to the Mississippi River so as control the trade of the Upper Mississippi River; and with these arguments made and presented forcibly the State of Illinois deliberately said that for all time they would never give another dollar to the canal system.

A few other words in regard to this amendment to this bill. As a member of the Committee on Commerce I voted against the amendment, and I desire to give very briefly my reasons for that vote. I voted against the amendment in committee, and oppose it here on the floor of the Senate, because, in the first place, it never has been the policy of the United States Government to give its appropriations to artificial communications inside particularly of a single State. When gentlemen invoke precedent here in the way of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the Sault Sainte Marie Canal, and other canals that have been mentioned, they will find upon investigation that in every such instance those canals have been constructed in order to go around and blockade the impediments in great national river courses in the country. The Louisville and Portland Canal was necessary in order to give free communication through the whole length of the Ohio River, and so in every other case.

But if the Congress of the United States has the power and establishes the precedent of constructing a canal inside of the geographical limits of one State under the pretense that it is necessary to the great commercial system of the country, where is it to stop? Is there any end or any limit to a power like that?

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to one fact?

Mr. VEST. Well.

Mr. McMILLAN. The improvement already in progress and under the charge and expense of the Government of the United States, known as the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement, is entirely within one State, and between the very same great bodies of water that this one is, Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, and the canal is cut through land to connect the streams together on that route, and the Senator has voted for an appropriation of $250,000 for that improvement in this very bill, and has been doing so for years.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the Fox and Wisconsin Canal is an unfortunate illustration for the Senator. It is in order to obviate a natural obstruction in those two rivers at their junction, as I understand, that that canal has been made, and to make an entirely continuous water-course; but even if it were absolutely true that the Senate has done that in this instance——

Mr. McMILLAN. One runs into the Mississippi River, the other into Lake Michigan, and this canal connects them together.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; for a very short distance.

Mr. McMILLAN. I suppose the distance or length of the canal does not make much difference in the principle; whether it is five miles or fifty miles, the principle is the same.

Mr. VEST. That canal, as the Senator from Wisconsin tells me, is one mile long; here is a canal of sixty-five miles.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the length of the canal make any difference in principle? Will the Senator from Missouri answer?

Mr. VEST. I suppose not to the Senator.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does it make a difference with the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir. I say this makes the very greatest difference, because here is the construction of a canal sixty-five miles long which is the absolute creation of a new mode of communication. In the other case it is simply like cutting through an embankment, you might say, or dredging a river, which has been done over and over again.

Mr. McMILLAN. Precisely the same as the Hennepin Canal, except that one is shorter than the other.

Mr. VEST. One is sixty-five times as long as the other, and it makes no sort of difference, then, to the Senator in the principle. We have straightened rivers; we have cut through embankments; we have cut down cliffs in order to straighten water-courses; but we have always done it as an adjunct. We have done it in the case of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers as an adjunct to those two streams. Here is a canal running without any pretense that it goes near any water-course; it goes away from one; it goes from the Illinois River to the Mississippi, and there is no pretense that there is any navigable stream near it or jurisdiction of the United States obtained over it.

Mr. President, if we can construct this canal, if the constitutional power exists now in the Government of the United States, I boldly assert here that we can make a railroad inside of a State; we can make a turnpike inside of a State; we can make a line of telegraph poles or telephone poles or any other improvement that the Government of the United States sees proper to adopt. And as to the assertion that it is necessary to commerce, let any gentleman take my place upon the Committee on Commerce, and hear the arguments repeated there day after day in favor of all the creeks of the country, when we are told in most eloquent tones session after session that if this stream, this river, this harbor, is not improved, and that immediately, Liberty lies bleeding in the streets and the Constitution is worth nothing. There is not a stream in the United States, the representative of which——

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator permit me to read him an expression from one of the great statesmen of the country, to whose opinion perhaps he will assent?

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt twenty-five years from now that the declarations of the Senator himself will be read as precedents. I can find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD declarations for any monstrosity.

Mr. McMILLAN. That would be a higher honor than I can hope for; but if the Senator will permit me to read a sentence I will give him an expression of views from one of the great statesmen of the country. Perhaps he will recognize him as one of his own political friends.

Mr. VEST. Oh, yes; go ahead.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Calhoun, when Secretary of War, was called upon by a resolution of the House of Representatives to report to that House at their next session "a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress for the purpose of opening and constructing such roads and canals as may deserve and require the aid of Government, with a view to military operations in time of war, the transportation of munitions of war, and also a statement of the works of the nature above mentioned which have been commenced, the progress which has been made, and the means and prospect of their completion; and, together with such information as in the opinion of the Secretary shall be material in relation to the objects of the resolution." And he remarks:

I have the honor to make the following report:

A judicious system of roads and canals, constructed for the convenience of commerce, and the transportation of the mail only, without any reference to military operations, is itself among the most efficient means for "the more complete defense of the United States."

And he proceeds with a long report in answer to that resolution, signed by himself, and addressed to Hon. Henry Clay, Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which he fully sustains the doctrine which the Senator here disputes.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that it is too late to send the mail by canal as Mr. Calhoun suggested.

Mr. McMILLAN. That does not change his views of the matter.

Mr. HAWLEY. The whole problem is changed.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does that change the constitutional principle?

Mr. HAWLEY. No.

Mr. VEST. As the Senator from Minnesota has relieved himself of that historical quotation, I have simply to say that in the declarations of gentlemen who have been infected with the Presidential fever you can find every sort of assertion of that kind. Mr. Calhoun was a great man, a great statesman, but he was like every other statesman who became infected with the desire to be President of the United States. There is no limit to the affability and the complacence of a gentleman afflicted with that desire in regard to public questions. I do not care what Mr. Calhoun said; I do not care what any other statesman, living or dead, said on this question. I say that if the proposition is once established by the Congress of the United States that we can go into the limits of a State, and that without reference to a navigable stream we can take jurisdiction of the naked land and construct a railroad or a turnpike or a canal, then there is no limit to the expenditure and the extravagance that will follow such a claim of power.

Why, Mr. President, just look at it! This is no partisan question. Let us look at it as Senators representing sovereign States. What is this project? Suppose we build this canal; whether it costs three million or twenty million or one hundred million, what is the legitimate corollary and the logical result? The Government of the United States owns it absolutely without reference to the State of Illinois, for that is the provision of the bill. Illinois must cede all jurisdiction. It is, then, a Government work; the officers are appointed by the Government; the agents who control it are officers of the Government.

The Senator from Minnesota invokes principle. Very good; let us have principle. If you can build a canal sixty-five miles from Hennepin to a navigable water highway, you can build one for six hundred and fifty miles, and the next thing we hear will be an immense canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, or to connect the Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico by a great governmental highway controlled by the Government, officered by the Government, paid by the Government, used by political partisan administrations to control the Government, and where is the end? I protest against the principle as one destroying absolutely the fundamental idea of a representative and free government. There is no end to it. You talk of centralization; I say it in no partisan sense. Establish this doctrine of the right of the Government to build a canal, a railroad, a turnpike, inside of a State and away from the water jurisdiction of the Government, and you give at once away forever the principle that this is a government by the people under limited constitutional and written powers.

Now, Mr. President, as to the cost of this work. The Senator from Illinois says that the estimate is $3,000,000; and the Senator from Iowa stated it yesterday at $3,900,000. I confess my inability to understand the reports if that is the case. The report of Colonel Macomb made on January 25, 1875, five years after the State of Illinois, by constitutional amendment, had given up the control of this improvement, after it had been in the hands of the Government, uses these words:

Indeed, the Hennepin Canal, without the improvement of the Upper Illinois River and the enlargement of the eastern portion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, would be useless as an outlet for the freights of the Upper Mississippi River.

The Senator from Illinois says that refers to a ship-canal. It must refer to a commercial canal, because it refers to the freights of the Upper Mississippi, and to vessels coming from the Upper Mississippi, barges such as are used on the Mississippi River for the transportation of grain, and he says that without the enlargement of the eastern portion of this canal the western portion of it will be absolutely useless, and he says that this improvement will cost the Government at least $20,421,819.

But, Mr. President, that is not all of it. The Senator from Iowa yesterday spoke in regard to the water-power. I have before me, connected with the minority report made in the House, a letter from citizens of Illinois, which I ask the Secretary to read, and I ask the Senator from Illinois in regard to the standing of these gentlemen. I suppose he has seen it. I ask the Secretary to read the letter commencing where I have marked. That letter is addressed to Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, and is appended to the House minority report. I know one of the gentlemen who signs it; I do not know the rest.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

By the report of Colonel John N. Macomb made to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, January 25, 1875, it will be seen that his assistant, Mr. F. C. Doran, who had charge of the survey of the Hennepin Canal, estimates the amount of water required for such improvement at 2,064 cubic feet per second. He does not give a gauge of the flow of water in Rock River, but one is given by a former assistant to Colonel Macomb, Mr. Gorham P. Low, who reported April 10, 1871, "We were fortunate in making a careful measurement of the amount of water flowing in the Rock River at a time, October 11, 1870, when, according to the residents of that city, the river was at its lowest known stage. The amount of water at that date was found to be 2,446 cubic feet per second."

If 2,064 cubic feet per second is needed for the canal, then in low water 84.38 per cent. of the total flow of water will be diverted, or, practically speaking, the whole river would be turned into the canal and all water-power below that point totally destroyed.

The cities of Sterling and Rock Falls, with a population of 8,000 people, have been built up almost entirely by manufacturing enterprises which have been located on the water-power afforded by the Rock River, which flows between them. The loss to the manufacturing establishments by the destruction of the water-power could possibly be estimated by taking into account the sum of $200,000,000 invested therein, and the sum of $600,000,000 of manufactured articles shipped therefrom every year. But it is impossible to estimate or pay for the loss to other individuals in these cities whose business is not manufacturing, but whose prosperity or ruin is involved in the success or failure of the manufacturing interests. It would be well to mention here that there are several other manufacturing points on Rock River below us, which would be injured and would also look to the Government for relief.

In the estimate above referred to, for the amount of water required, a ship-canal is provided for, and as the main agitators of the Hennepin scheme are always claiming that it is a work of national importance, it is but fair to assume that the ship-canal is what they are really after.

Secondly. We are opposed to this bill because of the enormous expenditure of the public money involved in the scheme when fully developed, the first step being an appropriation of a single million of dollars, and the ultimate result the payment of at least $125,000,000 from the Government Treasury. The engineers' estimate of a commercial canal from Hennepin to Rock Island, as reported to Colonel Macomb April 10, 1871, was $3,899,723.

In his later report, dated January 25, 1875, Colonel Macomb says: "Indeed, the Hennepin Canal, without the improvement of the Upper Illinois River, and the enlargement of the eastern portion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, would be useless as an outlet for the freight of the Upper Mississippi River." He therefore gives as his estimate of the total cost of a commercial canal, or, as he calls it, "a navigable water-way from the Mississippi River, near Rock Island, to Chicago on Lake Michigan," the sum of $20,421,819.

We have no estimates of Government engineers of the cost of enlarging the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the ship-canal size, but assuming the increase of cost over that of enlarging to the smaller size canal to be in the same proportion as the two estimates for the Hennepin Canal part, which are as $4,000,000 to $12,500,000, and we have the estimate of Colonel Macomb of $20,500,000 for a commercial canal raised to $64,000,000 for a ship-canal from river to lake. Now, keeping in mind the fact that Government works constructed in the past under the management of Government engineers and paid for by partial appropriations by Congress from year to year have generally cost nearly double the original estimates, (as for a notable instance the canal around the Des Moines Rapids of the Mississippi River, which was originally estimated at about $2,600,000 and actually cost about $5,000,000,) and we have, as before intimated, as the final result of this entering-wedge of an appropriation of $1,000,000, the expenditure of not less than $125,000,000.

That we are not alone in regarding this Hennepin-Canal scheme as an entering-wedge to other gigantic schemes for the spending of public money for local benefits is evident by the following extract from the Chicago Tribune of March 11, 1882. The extract is from an article giving an account of the views of Messrs. Martin Kingman, of Peoria, and B. F. Shaw, of Dixon, canal commissioners of the State of Illinois, on various questions pertaining to the Illinois and Michigan Canal. The article concludes as follows:

"As to the effect of the success of the Hennepin-Canal scheme upon the Illinois and Michigan ditch, the commissioners thought it would be beneficial, and they hope the friends of the measure would succeed in getting Congress to grant the subsidy asked for. The completion of the Hennepin Canal would, they believed, be the entering-wedge to the embankment and deepening of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and making it eventually a ship-canal of sufficient capacity to accommodate the largest lake vessels, and even to transport men-of-war from the lakes to the Mississippi River."

Thirdly. We are opposed to this bill as inaugurating a scheme for the unnecessary expenditure of millions of the people's money.

The advocates of the canal claim a Government appropriation for building a national highway to cheapen transportation. They publish a map of the route, on which they give a statement comparing railway rates with what they assume rates will be through the proposed canal, and endeavor to show a saving of 50 per cent.

This statement is erroneous and defective. For instance, they give as the average cost of transporting a bushel of grain by rail to Chicago from Saint Paul, Winona, La Crosse, and Prairie Du Chien, 18.9 cents. We know from actual shipments made during the past five years from these points that the all-rail rate has not exceeded 12 cents per bushel on wheat, coarse grains being carried at lower rates; and at this low rate millers are allowed to stop the wheat at any point on the line, manufacture into flour, reload and ship through without further charge.

They assume the average cost of water transportation from these four points to be 10.5 cents per bushel. In this assumed rate they add nothing for elevator charges, cost of transfer to barges, or insurance on river and canal. If these necessary additions are made to their fictitious water rate, it would be increased to more than the actual rates now and heretofore charged by the railroads.

The State of Illinois many years ago, at great expense to the people, built the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and that canal, in connection with the Illinois River, was, for a considerable period, of great advantage to the country through which it passed. But this water-way has nearly outlived its usefulness, on account of the construction of two of the most prosperous railroads in the State, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, and the Chicago, Alton and Saint Louis, one on either side of the canal, and in close proximity to it. The canal, having the advantage of being built first with elevators and warehouses located on its banks along its entire length, has gradually lost the grain carrying trade, until now an examination of the line of the canal will show that the elevators have either been removed to the railroads or are going to decay about as fast as the weather will permit.

The railroads along the line of the canal are carrying nine-tenths of the grain, and at rates no less than are accepted by roads running through the northern part of the State, and not in the vicinity of the canal. This shows conclusively that our present canal cannot successfully compete for the freight in the section through which it passes, and to-day the citizens of Illinois would gladly turn it over to the General Government.

Now, if the railroads carry the grain shipped from points along our present canal, is it safe to assume for the proposed canal that the railways west of the Mississippi River will act as willing feeders to it, and collect the products of the country through which they pass, and deliver them over to the water-way at a rate which would be against their own interests?

Is it not much more reasonable to suppose that the railways now traversing Illinois, some fifteen in number, and which either own or control all the connecting lines west of the Mississippi River, will carry the freight through from the river to the lake at an expense but little, if any, greater than would be the cost to transfer to vessels or barges, and thus save to the shipper the entire expense of freight and time of shipment by the water-way proposed?

Finally, while we are willing to admit that there are some minor local advantages, both real and imaginary, which will benefit some of the friends of the scheme, such as the expected drainage of a large amount of swamp lands owned by interested parties, the building and maintaining at Government expense of a substantial stone dam at Dixon, the spending of further large sums of public money in and about Rock Island and Davenport, and the furnishing of much-needed sewerage for the city of Chicago, we at the same time earnestly protest against a scheme which, having actually no real merit as a national enterprise, will result in depriving the State of Illinois of numerous and valuable water-powers on Rock River, the only stream in the State which can furnish facilities for building up manufacturing enterprises that will be as valuable to her as those on the Merrimac are to Massachusetts.

Respectfully, yours

Hon. AMOS TOWNSEND,
Chairman Committee on Railways and Canals,
United States House of Representatives.

Mr. VEST. I have had this communication read. I know but one of the gentlemen signing it, as I stated, and him very slightly. The Senator from Illinois can state whether they are reputable men or not. They are a committee representing a meeting of two towns in the State of Illinois. They addressed the communication to a Representative in Congress, who placed it in his minority report on this question. If their statements are correct, this improvement works a manifest injury and a most serious one to the people on the route of this canal; it destroys the water-power; it does away, as they say, with the investment of millions upon millions of dollars of capital, and it is a most serious question whether the Government of the United States does not make itself responsible for this damage if the facts as stated by these petitioners or remonstrants against this project be at all true. I have had it read for what it is worth. It shows that the overwhelming advantages depicted so eloquently by the Senator from Iowa are not appreciated by the people on the route of this canal and within the State of Illinois.

But, Mr. President, let me say further that the era of canals has passed in this country; it is over; and you can no more go back to the canal system to-day than you can go back to the old mail-bag carried on the outside of a slow horse or a lazy mule. The era of canal building is ended in the United States. The temperament of our people, the genius of the age, the essence of our civilization, are all opposed to the canal system. It has been a failure. It has given way to the railroad. Even the highways which God himself created, and into which He pours the dews and rains of heaven, have given way to steam and electricity. Upon the great river on which I live, the Mississippi, the railroads have more than competed successfully with that great arterial highway of the continent. And yet gentlemen propose to expend millions of dollars upon the shallow and sluggish and artificial system created by men and denominated a canal. Pennsylvania has tried the canal system, and to-day it is a failure; not that the canals are not used, but wherever they come in competition with a railroad line the canal is useless and worthless. Virginia has sold her canals, the Senator from Alabama says, to a railroad company at about one-half, I believe, what they cost. Take the list of canals. Take the Fox and Wisconsin Canal, to which the Senator from Minnesota referred. The State of Wisconsin, after receiving a grant of land, begged the United States to take it off her hands, and they did so in 1856, and it has never been worth anything to commerce or navigation since. Take the list of the canals which I have before me: the Wabash and Erie, running from Evansville on the Ohio River to Toledo; the Miami Canal, from Cincinnati to Toledo; the Ohio Canal, from Portsmouth, on the Ohio River, to Plymouth on Lake Erie. The time was, before the snort of the locomotive was heard in the western wilderness, when these canals were considered great mediums of communication between respective communities. What are they to-day? Their sluggish and slimy trace is hardly ever disturbed, except by a rotten team that drags its slow length along in the wake of the hustling locomotive that connects the cities and binds together the commerce of the continent.

Look at the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, right at our doors here. How does it compete with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad? For months past to my certain knowledge not one single canal-boat has marked its murky surface, while the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has poured millions upon millions of valuable freight into New York and into Baltimore, and into Philadelphia. The era of canals has passed and gone; the civilization of the country has left them far behind. It is useless for gentlemen to-day to talk of depleting the Treasury to build a canal when a railroad at one-third the cost would do five times the work and be five times the assistance and value to the people of the United States.

But Senators say they want a water communication between the Illinois River and the Mississippi. Why, to-day, sir, there are six lines of communication, six systems running from Chicago to the Mississippi River, competing lines of railroad—the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul, the Illinois Central, the Chicago and Northwestern, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and the Chicago and Alton Railroad. All these roads connect the State of Illinois in the north with that great grain-producing country in the Northwestern States; and I say it in no spirit of invidious distinction, for the great State of Illinois is a neighbor to my own State, and our people are bound together by a thousand ties of blood and of commercial relations. Illinois received from the Government, in order to build the Illinois and Michigan Canal, an enormous grant of the public lands amounting to near 300,000 acres. On the 2d of March, 1827, 290,915 acres of the public domain were granted to the State of Illinois for the construction of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. Besides that, Illinois since that time has received a pro rata distribution of the expenditures of the Government in the annually recurring river and harbor appropriations.

Now, Mr. President, is it right, is it proper, to strike down the great principle upon which our river and harbor bills have been enacted? Complaints are already made throughout the country at the reckless expenditures of Congress on the river and harbor bill. It is called to-day in the slang newspaper cant of the hour the monster steal, the elephantine plunder, and the newspapers of the land with their accustomed fertility in the use of pen and ink are to-day besmearing Congress with all sorts of adjectives because we have brought in a bill here of $20,000,000 for the natural highways of the country.

The Senator from Minnesota taunts me with having voted for this appropriation and that. God forgive me, Mr. President, I have voted under the duress of legislation for items in the annually recurring river and harbor bills that were against my judgment and against my conscience. I confess it. I was forced to do it by the necessities of my State and of the great section to which I belong. The great rivers and natural highways of the country came to this House loaded down with the trout streams and the miserable little inlets, and the argument made over and over again was that they were adjuncts to the great national highways, that they floated down their proportionate and pro rata share of the productions of the country to the great arterial modes of communication which God had created. But can there be even that argument for this project and this scheme? Can there be even the miserable pretext that this canal has ever been created in the smallest degree a natural highway for any purpose whatever? What water-course is it to serve? What great stream does it help to remove the obstructions in? It is made, as I said before, out of demands springing from the imagination or the inventive faculty of men. I assail no one's motive; I make no pretext that this is any other than a legitimate enterprise in all its purposes; but I attack it on the broad principle that when $100,000, $50,000, $10,000, or $1 is given outside of the principles upon which we have hitherto based our river and harbor improvements—that is, the improvement of the great natural water-courses of the country and of the streams that are subsidiary and adjunct thereto—when you break down this principle you let in a flood compared to which the resounding ocean is a mere rivulet trickling down a hillside. There is no end to it. Afterward the Government will be called upon to take possession of any scheme and every scheme that is necessary, as it is alleged, to the commerce of the country. Instead of being the representative of the people under a limited and written constitution, the Government becomes a limitless and expanding agency for spending the money of the people for political purposes.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina, and providing a temporary government therefor.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let it be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business to proceed with the consideration of the river and harbor bill. If there be no objection such will be the order. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into a general discussion with the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator as to the constitutionality of this measure. As far as I am concerned, I have no doubt of the power of Congress to do what is here proposed. I will only make a suggestion in response to him by way of interrogatory. I believe a part of the system that is known as the Mississippi River improvement (if I may term it a system) includes, at least in theory, the making of a canal across the northern part of the isthmus of Florida. I do not mean that that is included in this bill, but I mean that that is part of the argument, and it is finally to be the result. I am speaking of what I know the advocates of that proposition finally propose, a canal across Florida for the purpose of making a water-way. Democrats propose it and Republicans propose it. Whether it will be done or not is another question.

So far as the question of internal improvements within the States is concerned, the only answer I desire to make to the Senator from Missouri is this: but a few years ago the same argument, that has been used to-day against the proposition to make this canal from Rock Island to Hennepin was made against improving rivers within a State; precisely the same argument, that it was unconstitutional, and by the same political organization that we hear it from to-day. I find, however, that the Constitution has been so construed here latterly that rivers, very small rivers, in the Senator's own State, in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and elsewhere are being appropriated for. That was unconstitutional a few years ago. I never believed it was unconstitutional. I have always believed the Government had power to do it for the benefit of commerce if they considered that it was necessary. I believe so now. Senators come here and ask for money for the cutting away of a bar in the Tennessee River, a bar that prevents any kind of a boat passing over it for a mile and a half or two or three miles; cutting a canal through it really. It is making through that bar, that rock channel, an absolute canal, and you appropriate money for it. It is unconstitutional to throw up earth on each side and make a water-way, but perfectly constitutional to cut for fifteen or twenty miles through stone to make a water-way for steamers! That is what you do when you vote for it. You take your rivers all over the South, and you have asked us to vote to cut away bars, rock bars, to cut through stone to open rivers to give you a channel so that boats may pass up and down; but on the prairies of Illinois if we desire a system to connect the Mississippi River with the lakes and connect the lakes together so as to give us an outlet east by water transportation it at once becomes unconstitutional. It is perfectly constitutional in the estimation of the Senator from Missouri to build levees from one end of the Mississippi River to the other to keep the water within its channel; but it is unconstitutional to throw the dirt out and build levees on the side to let water in.

If the water is already there it is constitutional to make a levee, but if the water is not there it is unconstitutional to make a levee to let the water in! That is the argument of the Senator; that is his position. It is perfectly constitutional to appropriate $6,000,000 for cutting points off the Mississippi River, making levees in the Mississippi River, running levees up sloughs and bayous and things of that kind to keep it in its channel; but it is unconstitutional to connect the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers! That may be in the estimation of the Senator good logic, but I cannot see it.

Now, I will call the Senator's attention to another thing. He made a report at this session of Congress, which I have in my hand, in favor of the Government of the United States giving a subsidy of $50,000,000 to build a railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec to pass ships over from one ocean to the other. He made that report himself. That was constitutional. Why? Because it is outside of the United States; but if you propose to do it inside of the United States it would be unconstitutional! That is the reason, is it? Under our Constitution we can do anything on top of God Almighty's earth if we go off our own soil, but we cannot do it on our own soil. We have jurisdiction on our own soil to do certain things, but certain other things that we undertake to do by Congress we must march outside of the United States to do! I cannot understand it. My mind is so constituted that I cannot see the distinction. I cannot understand how it is that we can constitutionally appropriate $50,000,000—we have not done that, but the Senator can be in favor of it—as a subsidy for building a railroad called the Eads railroad across the Isthmus to pass ships over because the ships do not go in the water! If we undertake to dig a canal for them to run over, it is unconstitutional; but to make a railroad to pull them over is perfectly constitutional! I suppose if we were to employ Mr. Eads to build a railroad from Rock Island to Hennepin to run ships over it would be perfectly constitutional; but if we undertake to dig in the ground and put in water to float them over it is unconstitutional!

I listened to the Senator's argument, and he had a letter read, written by some gentlemen in Illinois; very nice gentlemen. I have nothing to say against them. They live at Sterling, a manufacturing town in my State. Some of the manufacturers there were alarmed for fear Rock River was going to be run dry by this canal, and they opposed it; but, strange to say, Whiteside County, the county in which Sterling is situated, by the last Legislature was added to the Congressional district represented by General HENDERSON, of Illinois, and General HENDERSON in Congress has been a leading advocate of the Hennepin Canal all the time that he has been in Congress, some eight years; and the very town from which this letter came, and that county being added to General HENDERSON'S district, was the first county which unanimously asked him to run for Congress again within the last few weeks. He is the advocate of the canal that is going to ruin these people. I do not want to discuss that proposition. About the notions of those men I have nothing to say. They are very good people, but it is idle for the Senator to tell me that that is an argument against the proposition.

The Senator asked why it is that Illinois should put a provision in her constitution prohibiting the people from being taxed to build a railroad or a canal if canals are of any profit. Now, I will try—I do not know whether I can succeed or not—to answer that. In the first place, are canals profitable? He says certain canals are not; it depends on their locality as to whether they are profitable or not. So it does with railroads; so with any other kind of business. It depends on where the canals are, what they connect with, the country through which they pass, and so on. Suppose the Senator takes the great canal of New York, the Erie Canal, for illustration. Is that profitable? Railroads run right along by the side of it. Do they carry all the freight and leave the canal to dry up? Has the Senator ever examined to see whether that canal has given profit to the State of New York or not? If so, he will find it has afforded a balance, after all expenses have been paid, to the treasury of New York of over $41,000,000.

Take the Illinois and Michigan Canal, running from Chicago to the Illinois River, that we propose to make a continuous line to the Mississippi by making this Hennepin Canal. It cost $6,500,000. It has long since paid that into the treasury of the State, and over $150,000 net profit annually. It was not because of the fact that it did not pay anything and was drying up that the constitutional inhibition was imposed. Go along that canal to-day, and a railroad traverses it from one end to the other almost, and you see it filled with canal-boats carrying lumber and all kinds of products, and they carry them to your own State, from Chicago to the city of Saint Louis. It is a profitable canal; but the State of Illinois has had sad experience in reference to internal improvements. In 1835 she undertook to build railroads in the State. Canals were regarded as part of the general improvement system of the State of Illinois. Many years ago, before I knew anything about these systems or the politics of the State, Illinois undertook to build the Illinois Central Railroad, and other roads traversing the State. The State expended about $13,000,000, and then abandoned the improvement system because it was discovered that the State, having charge of it, it perhaps would be a failure to a certain extent, and it was turned over to the Illinois Central Railroad Company by the State of Illinois, after having a portion of it graded, because it could be better managed and more easily perhaps by a company. The people got alarmed at the increase of the debt. About the time they proposed that Illinois should not appropriate money for railroads and canals, the State of Illinois was emerging from debts, getting them paid off, and they determined that the State should not be embarrassed any more, and to-day it is one of the States of the Union that does not owe one cent in the world. They made their arrangements that the Illinois Central Railroad, when they turned over the charter to the company, should pay annually into the treasury of Illinois 7 per cent. of their earnings. That goes into our treasury. The people of Illinois do not wish to enter into any internal-improvement system. When they commenced the system the people did not know where it would end; it was feared the State might undertake large and extensive systems of railroads and canals; and hence they put that provision in their constitution, and very wisely, in my judgment.

There was another reason for it. All the people of this country, or nearly all, had about come to the conclusion that these great improvements for commercial purposes had better be made by the Government of the United States; just as you gentlemen on that side of the Chamber ask the Government to make them in your States. We in Illinois came to about the same conclusion, that these things were better made for the benefit of commerce by the Government of the United States; hence we were willing to turn over these projects to the Government of the United States, that it might handle them under the charge of the Engineer Corps of the Army. Upon the same principle that the Senator from Missouri asks money to improve the rivers and navigable waters of his State, instead of the State itself doing it, Illinois acted, and said, "We will turn these improvements over to the National Government." It was on account of that, and not because the canal had been an expensive improvement to the people of Illinois, as intimated by the Senator.

Mr. President, there is a difference sometimes as to where an improvement is, as to the influence that it has upon our minds. Of course the Senator from Missouri believes this is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, but my honest judgment is, if it was between Saint Louis and Chicago, not that he would look at it as constitutional, but his opposition would not be near so strong. It is unfortunately so situated that it is north of Saint Louis, that it goes across from the Mississippi River to the Illinois River and connects the Mississippi River with the chain of lakes; and it is expected in the future, and I have no doubt that it will be done some day, that Lake Michigan and Lake Erie will be connected, so that the canal that runs across through that part of the State of New York will be a continuous system across the lakes, in connection with the Mississippi River and the Illinois River. I believe the time will come when that will be done, and it will be a great and important work when it is done.

I would not detract from the importance of the opening of the Mississippi River and of lines that would naturally benefit the people of the State of Missouri and my own State, too; but there is a grand, large, growing western country that must have more of outlet than that; and when Senators stand here and tell me that the time has passed for such things, that this is the day and age of railroads, I agree that it is the day and age of railroads, but being the day and age of railroads the people of this country must have something at least to have an effect and an influence upon the railroads so that they shall not be robbed at every step they go. The very arguments that are made against the canal system that has been proposed here are the arguments that are made by the president of every railroad company that runs to Chicago and that crosses west. To-day you cannot find one of them but will argue against the Hennepin Canal, against the water-ways generally, against the appropriation of money to improve the rivers. Every one of them will tell you that the day has passed for that thing, the time has come when the whole country will be checkered with railroads and every product will be gathered in cars and carried over the iron rails from one part of the country to the other. That may be so. It certainly will be so if we are determined that the people of this country shall have no water improvements and that railroads shall do all the carrying trade. But I say to the Senator from Missouri that the farmers of the West, when they understand that the profit they might make on their wheat, their corn, their oats, their barley, and everything else that they raise is fixed and determined by the great corporations of this country, will inquire into it. When there is a good crop year the railroad companies see exactly what it costs to produce their commodities and then charge enough as the cost of transportation to swallow up all the profit, so that the farmer only gets a bare recompense for his labor. These people ask that you shall do something that will relieve them from the onerous burdens that are affixed upon them all over this country. I say to Senators to-day that I believe in railroads as much as anybody else, but I want them conducted so as to treat the people fairly, and the only way you can cause them to do exactly what is right with the people is to show them that there is something else that can carry the products of this country besides the railroads. Give us an opening to the seaboard, give us a water-way from the West to the seaboard, and our farmers throughout the country will have profit to put in their pockets as well as the great corporations of the country. It is idle for any one to tell me that a man can put fifty millions in his pocket by the honest profit made by transportation in this country where fair prices are charged. It is all nonsense to tell me that every corporation becomes rich that transports the products of this country, and that everybody connected with them becomes rich and they become rich merely from fair charges against the farming and producing classes. The very men that we should protect in this country and see that they are protected against extortion are the men who ask that this thing shall be done, so that you shall give them a connecting line between the Mississippi River and the Illinois River, whereby they can have water transportation clear through to New York finally.

Now, Mr. President, as to the cost of this canal. Suppose it should cost $10,000,000 finally—so much this year, so much next year, so much the following year——

Mr. VEST. If I do not interrupt the Senator, let me make a suggestion in order to settle that question. I understood him to say when he was on the floor before that he did not think any report of Macomb could be produced for 1875 stating that this would cost $20,000,000. I have sent for the report and I ask the Senator to look at it if he has any doubt about it. The date of this report is "Rock Island, Illinois, January 25, 1875." It refers to the commerce of the Upper Mississippi River and says the cost will be $20,421,819.

Mr. LOGAN. The cost of what?

Mr. VEST. A commercial canal.

Mr. LOGAN. The Hennepin Canal?

Mr. VEST. The Hennepin Canal.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. VEST. Here is the report.

Mr. LOGAN. I will examine the report. The Senator will find this to be the fact, that there is no estimate of that kind made unless it is based upon the future expense of opening communication clear through to Chicago, and is not for the Hennepin Canal merely. That is exactly what it says, and that is exactly what I say, that the estimate was $18,000,000 and something over, made by Wilson in the last report made, and that was for completing a canal from the Mississippi River to Chicago, opening the Illinois River and widening the Illinois and Michigan Canal. That is what that report is.

Mr. VEST. With the Senator's permission I call his attention to the fact that Colonel Macomb says in this report that the western part of the canal is absolutely useless unless the improvement is made on the eastern.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has repeated that several times, and I have tried to answer it.

Mr. VEST. There it is.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CONGER. The Senator will excuse me a moment. Since that report was made the Congress of the United States has appropriated for the improvement mostly of that upper end of the canal between three and four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. That includes the Illinois River from Hennepin to La Salle. That improvement is going on to-day; whether you build this canal or not you expend the money, and there is the strange thing to me, that the Senator still keeps putting that in, that it costs that, continually. It makes no difference whether you build the Hennepin Canal or not, you are still expending that money that he is counting now against the Hennepin Canal. It is in this bill to-day.

Mr. VEST. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, I am not mistaken. The money appropriated for the Illinois River is for the improvement of the Illinois up to where that canal intersects the Illinois River at La Salle. That is the very part of the river from La Salle to Hennepin. The State has a lock and dam there that cost $450,000 and turned them over to the Government, and you are appropriating money now for the completion of that improvement.

Mr. VEST. I dislike to interrupt the Senator; I beg his pardon in advance. I suppose we want the facts in regard to this matter. If I understand the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Michigan, it is asserted that we are appropriating money yearly to make the very improvement of which Colonel Macomb speaks.

Mr. LOGAN. On the Illinois River.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from Michigan pretend to say that we have appropriated a dollar for the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal?

Mr. LOGAN. Nobody has said that.

Mr. VEST. Then I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he is palpably mistaken, because Colonel Macomb says:

> Indeed the Hennepin Canal, without the improvement of the Upper Illinois River—

If he stopped there the Senator would be right—> and the enlargement of the Eastern portion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal would be useless.

Therefore we are not appropriating money for the improvement spoken of by Colonel Macomb; it is partially appropriated for the Illinois River, but the largest portion of it goes to the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

Mr. LOGAN. When the Senator says that he is probably a little mistaken. It is a very nice thing to make himself right by technicalities. I have asserted all the time, I assert it again, that this canal is to intersect the Illinois River at Hennepin; that the Illinois and Michigan Canal intersects the Illinois River at La Salle, and that the Illinois River between Hennepin and La Salle is appropriated for now, and has been for years, and that is the very improvement of the Illinois River of which Macomb speaks. I said nothing about the Illinois and Michigan Canal, but the very improvement of the Illinois River referred to by Colonel Macomb is being appropriated for every year by Congress, and has been for the last five years. Hence that part of the Senator's argument goes for nothing. So far as the Illinois and Michigan Canal is concerned that is an after question; it has no connection with this at this time. If you build the commercial canal from Hennepin to Rock Island it will connect with the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which is a commercial canal to-day from Chicago to La Salle. If you make the commercial canal from Rock Island to Hennepin you then have practically a commercial canal from Rock Island to Chicago, because the Illinois and Michigan Canal is a commercial canal to-day and boats pass up and down every day of the year transporting lumber and other products of the country. So, for the purpose of having a commercial canal, appropriations are already made and work has already been done. So far as the work on the eastern part of the canal is concerned, what does the Senator refer to? Does not the Senator know that within the last few years the people of Chicago themselves have done the work, they have turned the Chicago River, so that instead of running into Lake Michigan to-day it has been deepened and widened and cut into the canal until Lake Michigan runs through the Chicago River into the canal. So that part of the work has been done by the citizens of Chicago. The Chicago River has been turned, and, instead of running as it did formerly, it now runs toward its source, and to-day is part of the canal we may say. So when you come to examine this question and the objections you make, a portion of the objections are obviated and already done away with.

Then take the whole system. You build this Hennepin Canal, as it is called, and with the Chicago River turned from the lake into the canal as it is to-day, not estimated for, but done by the people of Chicago themselves, having become as it were, a part of the canal, you then have running water from Lake Michigan down to the mouth of the Illinois River, and you have a channel that boats can pass through from Lake Michigan, through Chicago down to La Salle, and down the Illinois River and through the Hennepin Canal to Rock Island. So vessels can come back and get into the lake. To give us an outlet from the lake there and communication from the river to the lake is one of the most important things, in my judgment, that could be done, for that portion of the country. I do not speak of Illinois alone; I speak of Illinois, of Iowa, of Wisconsin, of Minnesota, and all the country north that borders on the Mississippi River. There is not one of those States that to-day does not understand and know the necessity absolutely of this improvement for that purpose.

I understand perfectly well that it might cut off some of the freight on some of the railroads that run through there and cross at Rock Island and run through Iowa and to Saint Louis. I want to see a competing line, a water route which will compete with that character of transportation, so that the people may have an opportunity at least of getting some profit from the products of the soil.

Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say. If I had been here when this question came up, probably I should have discussed it in a different way. I returned only last night, after an absence of several days, and merely picked up the discussion that was on yesterday without being able to examine it any further at this time. Therefore, I desire to say no more than what I have said in reference to the matter.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, a single word in reply to the Senator from Illinois. The Senator has seen proper to intimate that my opinions on this question are influenced by locality.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, no; I did not intimate that.

Mr. VEST. Because I live in the State of Missouri.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not intimate that. The Senator misunderstood me. I said it would not change the Senator's opinion so far as the constitutional question was concerned; but that, if it was lower down, perhaps he might not be so strongly opposed to the proposition. That is what I said.

Mr. VEST. In other words, the Senator uses the suggestio instead of the actual affirmation. For my own part, I would always prefer the affirmation. "If it was lower down," my constitutional opinion might be different!

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I did not say that.

Mr. VEST. To settle that question, let me say that, as to what are the merits of this proposition, it makes no difference what my constitutional opinion is, or that of the Senator from Illinois, one way or the other. He presents his arguments; I present mine; and in the great forum of public opinion, which after all regulates the affairs of this country, the two will be weighed without reference to any personalities.

The Senator from Illinois lives in the great city of Chicago. I would not intimate for a minute that his locality influences that Senator. I confess for myself that I am so imperfectly constructed and organized that locality, to some extent, does influence me. Upon this question my constitutional opinions will apply to any canal in any portion of the Union of similar construction. I shall oppose all of them, I say now, inside of a State and not auxiliary to the great water-courses of the country, whether they are north, south, east, or west.

One other word, and I am done. The Senator from Illinois refers to a report which I had the honor to make in favor of the Tehuantepec Railroad. I do not envy the logical accuracy of any gentleman's mind who is able to draw a parallel between the Hennepin Canal scheme, or a similar scheme, and the Tehuantepec Railroad. The clause in the Constitution of the United States which gives to Congress the absolute power to regulate the foreign commerce of the United States has received immediate construction by the Supreme Court. I take it there is no shadow of doubt, as a military proposition and a commercial proposition, in any aspect of that clause, that the Congress of the United States has power to construct a railroad or to donate money for that purpose. It is a question so great that the limits of this debate will not permit me now to go into it. I had hoped at another time in the session before this, but for the providential interposition which struck down the principal projector of that enterprise, to have brought that great subject to the attention of the Senate of the United States. I could now, it seems to me, say so much in its favor, and so much in regard to the constitutional phase of it, that even the Senator from Illinois, who has intimated his opposition to that proposition, would not make a shadow of a stand upon that branch of the case at least.

Mr. LOGAN. How is that? The Senator from Illinois said nothing about his opposition to it.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senator to say that we had not given $50,000,000, and he said it in such a way that I inferred he did not propose to give it.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I said Congress had not yet given it. I said nothing about my opinion.

Mr. VEST. Then I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not propose to give my opinion about it. I have an opinion on the subject, that is very true, but I did not propose to give it on this occasion. I merely said that by way of remark. I said nothing about my opinion, nor did I criticise the Senator's opinion in that particular. I only said in reference to the argument which has been made here on the Constitution that I did not see how the Constitution could sustain that measure and reject this.

Mr. VEST. The Senator does not think that is unconstitutional?

Mr. LOGAN. I think this proposition of ours is clearly constitutional.

Mr. VEST. I understand that.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say that the Senator's proposition was unconstitutional, but I was showing the analogy, as I made the argument with the Senator on one side and then on the other; that was all.

Mr. VEST. Very good. Then I confine myself to the single assertion that there is no analogy in a constitutional point of view between the two propositions. Under the power to regulate foreign commerce, which the Supreme Court has decided is the power to absolutely control it, the Congress of the United States would have the right for military purposes, if for no other, to use the Treasury of the people to make a railway anywhere, and for commercial purposes to construct a canal anywhere.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I will ask the Senator if under the Constitution in its broad sense in reference to regulating commerce between the States, Congress should take a notion to build a canal across Illinois from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan, in the State of Illinois, and then between Lake Michigan and Lake Erie, and so on to the border, would it not have power to do it? If that is the theory, would not that be regulating commerce between the States as much as the other proposition would be regulating the commerce of the world?

Mr. VEST. It is a very broad field of discussion, and one in which the Senator from Illinois and myself have both played some part, my own part very modestly and obscurely compared to his. My opinions are fixed upon that question. I do not choose now to go into so elaborate a discussion, but I will say that my construction of the Constitution of the United States is that ours is a dual government under a written constitution, with limited and specific grants of power; that the General Government under this written Constitution is the agent of the States which have created it for national purposes, and national purposes alone; and that when the States granted to Congress the power to regulate foreign commerce they gave to the General Government the exclusive right to say what should be done outside of the States, outside of the domain of the United States, for commercial or military purposes; but that the Constitution also limited the power of the General Government in so far as the territory of the States themselves was concerned, and where a State could do a work of improvement for itself the General Government had nothing whatever to do with it.

The power to improve the rivers of the United States, permit me to say to the Senator from Illinois, rests upon the ground that the jurisdiction of the United States under the Constitution extends like a mantle over the navigable waters of this country. The United States Government has no more right to improve a stream that is not navigable than it has to construct a turnpike or a canal upon the territory of a State. The only reason why these improvements are made is because reports are obtained from engineers in every case, and assertions are made by members of Congress in every case that all these little streams are navigable and Congress can vote upon them and remove certain obstructions. The great principle upon which we have always stood, both parties I will say, because in the exigencies of political affairs while both parties have wandered from fundamental principles still the principles have remained and have not been attacked by the leading members of either party, notwithstanding sporadic assertions made, I say respectfully to their memories, for electioneering purposes—the great principle has been that, jurisdiction going with navigation, the United States Government had the exclusive right and therefore the necessity rested upon the Government to improve these navigable streams.

This canal is not a navigable stream. It is an artificial work made where there is no navigable water. If it can be constructed, a railroad can be made anywhere, a canal can be put anywhere, if Congress can only be convinced that it is necessary as a connecting link to the commerce of the whole Union.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question. If I understand the argument of the Senator, it would go to this extent. Take the railroad charters, for instance, which are given by each State; no matter what their extortions might be, the power they exercise is unlimited unless restricted by their charters, and Congress could have no power to control, govern, or regulate a railroad.

Mr. VEST. The Senator is opening up another large question.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator's view as to the question.

Mr. VEST. I have my opinion upon that. I was in hopes a bill would come from the House of Representatives, in the discussion of which I proposed to state what I believe in regard to it. Permit me to say very respectfully to the Senator from Illinois that that does not touch this question. Whether we can control railroads already built across States, under the power to regulate commerce, is a mooted question. I do not propose to discuss that now. The question before us now is, have we a right to make an artificial stream where the jurisdiction of the Government does not extend inside of a State, within the limits of a State, where there is no pretense that it goes from one State to another; have we the right by the Constitution to make such a communication as that?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question if it does not disturb him.

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. It may show that my mind is in the condition in which he stated he did not envy the logical faculty of anybody in that condition, I am afraid. I agree with the Senator in believing that the Eads ship-railway project is a constitutional and an expedient project. The clause which gives Congress power is in these words:

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States.

It is in the same sentence. If we may constitutionally connect two great water-ways, the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, for the purposes of foreign commerce, by building a railroad or canal across the single foreign State of Mexico, within which we have no other jurisdiction, why can we not connect the two great water-ways, the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan, for the purpose of commerce among the several States, which will be conducted from one of those water-ways to another across the single State of Illinois, having no other jurisdiction there? I cannot see myself, and I wish the Senator would state, why the analogy suggested by the Senator from Illinois is not as absolute and perfect as it can be in such a case.

Mr. VEST. I am obliged to the Senator for bringing home to me my statement as to not envying a gentleman who will draw that parallel. I am still unable to do it. Unfortunately I may be so mentally constituted as not to see what the Senator from Massachusetts seems so positive about. The clause of the Constitution to which he refers says that Congress shall have the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations." That is a broad, limitless power.

Mr. HOAR. Any more than commerce among the States?

Mr. VEST. Much more so, if the Senator will permit me, in this——

Mr. HOAR. In what word of that sentence does the Senator find a more extensive jurisdiction in regard to the one matter than the other?

Mr. VEST. Because the latter part of the clause, referring to the States, says "between the several States."

Mr. HOAR. No; it does not.

Mr. VEST. Read the sentence.

Mr. HOAR. It reads, "among the several States."

Mr. VEST. Yes; "commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." What is the meaning of the phrase "among the States?" If the Senator's proposition is correct that any section of a railroad may be constructed in any county in the middle of a State, where is there any limit upon that power at all?

Mr. HOAR. I will state the proposition, if my honorable friend will permit me to interrupt him again. A railroad in a State, made for the purpose of accommodating the commerce of the citizens of that individual State with one another, does not come within this clause; but, to use Mr. Webster's phrase, when a railroad or a canal beginning in South Carolina and ending in South Carolina becomes of national importance and concern by reason that it accommodates and regulates and increases the commerce of the citizens of one State with the citizens of another, then it becomes subject to precisely the same power as the commerce with foreign States.

Mr. VEST. With due deference to the Senator, we have heard that argument over and over again from the time all of us entered public life; but here, after all, it comes down to this: if the Senator from Massachusetts is correct the logical deduction must be that Congress can construct a road anywhere that it pleases, for the reason that Congress believes that the road is necessary to national commerce.

Mr. HOAR. Exactly, anywhere for that purpose, undoubtedly. Take another illustration put by the Senator from Illinois, which the Senator from Missouri has not answered. It is proposed for the sake of the commerce of New Orleans with Europe and with the North to build a shore-line, to so call it, of water-ways, a part of which is within the State of Georgia or South Carolina, and a part of which consists in cutting a canal across the northern part of the peninsula of Florida. That canal is all within the State of Florida, but it is to be used by the commerce of the Southwest and the Northeast. Does the Senator himself question the power of Congress to build that canal, or does he say that if we had happened to admit East and West Florida as two separate States Congress could build it, but having admitted Florida as a single State it cannot build it?

Mr. VEST. We can dispose of that question when it comes before Congress. Each of these cases stands sui generis and by itself. I have my opinion in regard to that proposition. I have never heard it connected, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, with the Mississippi River scheme.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the theory.

Mr. VEST. I have never heard it. I was unfortunate, perhaps, in that. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts I simply say that I do not believe the convention of 1787, which framed the Constitution, meant any such thing as he says. I do not believe it, because if they had meant it they would never have put in the clause, "among the several States." If they intended that Congress should have the power to construct a road or to make an improvement wherever it pleased, they would have left it without words of limitation; they would have said that Congress should have power to construct works of internal improvement, and that would have been the end of it. The phrase "among the several States" is a limitation or it is nothing. If it is a limitation it means more than one State. There has been no project in any State in this Union that has not been advocated upon the ground that it was necessary to a great commercial system, to a national system, but I do not choose to go into that question.

Mr. HAWLEY. Of course, Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate at any great length. I am sorry it is not acceptable to the friends of this measure that we should provide for a very thorough survey and a complete estimate of the cost of this canal, to be reported to us in December, for I believe there would be a very large majority in favor of anything like a reasonable provision, but I do insist that there is not full information upon this subject. I insist that the only report we have directly applicable to it is the closing portion of the report of Civil Engineer Low in 1870, and he was not detailed for that work. He was sent to estimate for a large ship-canal. Afterward by word of mouth he was told by Macomb to inquire into this commercial and smaller canal that appears in the report. Low says to Macomb, "I was verbally instructed by you to make some estimates upon the smaller commercial canal," or words to that effect. That report is very brief; he does not cover the whole ground. He says that the general course of the new canal is indicated by dots on his former plan, and that by reason of this small cross-section it probably would follow the bluffs more closely, and thus effect a considerable saving in earth work. That is all.

There is an estimate outside of the ordinary duty of the engineer which I should like to have. I wish some person familiar with the management of canals would tell me how economical it is likely to be to take boats across the sixty-seven miles. I want the information for this reason: these boats are to be lifted two hundred and seven feet up and then let down about ninety or a hundred feet. That is a very serious problem. There are to be twenty-one very heavy locks to do it. Along the side of the canal, and all around it we may suppose, railroads will be running that will take freight at a rate of a cent a ton a mile, or upon long runs at seven mills per ton per mile, and they will go more than ten times as fast as you can possibly get the freight through the canal. It seems to me very reasonable to say that boats will require from two to three days to go through the sixty-seven miles. When left to themselves upon a canal on a long level they will make something like two miles an hour. That is my recollection of the Erie Canal, near which I once lived, but if there is any interruption at all a mile and a half an hour is a very good rate. But here are twenty-one locks, and if the canal is profitable at all the boatmen will find themselves crowded on in coming to the locks, and it will take considerable time to go through. I think it will be found to take from two to three days for a boat to go through. We will say, however, that the boat goes two miles an hour, but the freight train goes along easily at twenty miles an hour, and none of them think of making less than ten miles an hour, and each train takes as much as one of these large canal-boats.

These are the economical reasons that do not appear in the report which was made eleven years ago and were not required of the engineer; these are the reasons that make it exceedingly doubtful whether this thing is worth the cost, economically and commercially. Of course physically it is entirely possible.

With these general considerations is the fact that the canal business, the exploiting with canals, has become a very different thing now from what it was thirty years ago. There was a great fever of speculation in canals in this country between 1830 and 1835. Some five thousand miles of canal were projected, although not more than three thousand miles were ever built, and large lines which were then built have been entirely abandoned.

An eighty-mile canal was run across my State up to Northampton, Massachusetts, through a tolerably busy and fertile country, as nearly all New England is, which some thirty years ago was abandoned and now is grass-grown, and along by it runs the Canal Railroad. The State of New York built nine hundred miles of canal, more than five hundred miles of which were run at a loss. The Erie Canal is paying something like 3½ per cent., and if there was ever a canal in the world that by its location was entitled to expect a profitable return it was the Erie Canal; but the system has cost as a whole far more than the return, in apparent dollars and cents at least. I do not say that the Erie Canal has not been a great blessing to New York and to the country; but so far as the apparent dollar-and-cent investment is concerned she has paid far more money for those things than she has gained, and the Erie Canal has become, as all New Yorkers know, a very serious problem.

The State of Pennsylvania constructed canals, but after a time Pennsylvania got tired of them and sold out her canals. Ohio was very liberal and progressive in that matter and built extensive canals, but in 1861 Ohio sold her canals at one-tenth of 1 per cent. upon the cost of them. So that canals have been and are going out of fashion except in exceptional cases, like at the falls of the Saint Mary, and there they are generally what are called ship-canals, canals of greater width and greater depth than the one contemplated here, like the canal around the falls at Louisville. There is an immensely large lock, a lock more than twice the length of this, and of a very considerable width, I have forgotten, but at least one hundred and twenty-five feet long, at Louisville; they take a large steamboat through.

This is a very small and petty affair. It will inevitably be necessary, if this canal is good for anything at all, to double the size of the locks, and doubling the locks to make it good for anything you may as well count upon this as an expenditure of $10,000,000 to-day. You had just as well say this is a canal to cost $10,000,000, and if you accept from Illinois the profit of working a hundred miles of canal from Chicago to La Salle and on to Hennepin, you will then have the whole one hundred and eighty-six or one hundred and ninety miles upon your hands, to be converted by an irresistible pressure within ten years into a ship-canal drawing from ten to eighteen feet and forty or fifty feet wide at the bottom. That is what you are coming to beyond all question.

I have another suggestion to make on this matter. I am sorry to talk on it at all after so long a debate. This is a poor, petty thing: locks 21 feet wide and a canal 6 feet in depth. At the very outset you are to connect with this the Illinois and Michigan Canal, running from Chicago to La Salle, but that is a seven-foot canal. Your very bill provides for only a six-foot canal, and you propose to run in connection with it a canal with 7 feet depth. The boats that work with advantage in the Illinois and Michigan Canal cannot go into the Hennepin Canal at all, because that draws only 6 feet. If you are to make this valuable you ought to connect it with the Erie, but the Erie allows 7 feet draught and is 56 feet wide at the bottom. The width of the Erie you do not care so much about, but you want to allow boats which use the Erie and your own Illinois and Michigan Canal, which will directly connect, to go through the Hennepin Canal.

The whole scheme, Mr. President, to use a common and forcible expression, is "half-baked." If we are to have a connection from Albany straight through to Rock Island, let us have it deliberately counted upon and estimated and explained to us. You will have to give the Hennepin Canal, within a very few years, 7, 8, 10, or 12 feet draught to make it good for anything, and I have serious doubts myself whether your sixty-seven miles of canal carrying boats 207 feet in the air and letting them down 90 feet is going to pay. I should not be surprised to see you abandon it within ten years. You will have either to abandon it or quadruple its capacity.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to correct the Senator in one particular. He said there was no report except the report of Macomb to which he referred.

Mr. HAWLEY. Low's report.

Mr. LOGAN. Which was in 1871.

Mr. HAWLEY. In 1871. It is the only one I found in the engineers' volumes here.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator if he has read the report of Colonel Wilson, which was made in 1867?

Mr. HAWLEY. To cover this precise work?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir; I have not seen it. Does it contain an estimate for the same sized canal?

Mr. LOGAN. The same sized canal, 70 feet wide and 6 feet deep, at $4,600,000. That is the estimate made in 1867.

Mr. HAWLEY. He is more reasonable than the other man, who estimated it at $3,900,000.

Mr. LOGAN. He speaks of this canal as a necessity. The Senator knows Colonel Wilson very well, of course.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir. This proposition, I think, would be immensely stronger and more satisfactory if we had the sort of survey we ought to have, covering not only the maintenance of the work but the commercial view of it.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I propose to detain the Senate but a very few moments on this question; but having very carefully investigated it some nine or ten years ago in connection with a special committee appointed by the Senate, I cannot consent that the vote shall be taken without at least expressing my opinion about it.

I have not the least doubt as to the constitutionality of this measure. I will not discuss that. I think if we can open the Illinois River to connect it with the Mississippi River, so that steamers may pass around from one point to the other, we can cut across the narrow neck of land between those rivers. I believe that if we can cut around the narrows or falls on the Ohio River at Louisville, so as to connect the two parts of that river, we can, under the Constitution, connect one part of that river with a part of another river if it is cheaper to do it. I believe nobody would doubt that we could open the Illinois River to the Mississippi, so as to pass vessels around that sharp point.

If the argument presented by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] be sound we could not cut a single mile across the narrow neck between the Mississippi and the Illinois Rivers, because that would be a violation of the Constitution. I have no doubt, as I say, upon that subject. I do not believe that very many Senators have doubts about it, in view of all that Congress has done on the subject.

I wish to say with reference to the merits of this proposition that I believe there is no more meritorious proposition before the Senate. I believe there never has been a more meritorious proposition so far as the commerce of this country is concerned. It is proposed by the amendment to connect two of the greatest water systems in the world—so far as I know—the lake system and the Mississippi River system, separated now only by sixty-five miles, which it is proposed to cut by this canal.

In the investigations which were made on this subject by the special committee whose report has been quoted here to-day, it was ascertained upon proof taken from all over the country, in almost every State in the Union, from railroad men, from men connected with canals, and men in every other business connected with transportation, that transportation by water is about one-half cheaper than transportation by rail. It was so at that time; I do not think that quite so great a difference exists to-day so far as canals and railroads are concerned. There has been an improvement in the construction of railroads to some extent; but I believe that any fair, unprejudiced investigation of that question to-day will lead any Senator to the conclusion that there is at least 30 per cent. in favor of any reasonably well constructed canal as against the railroads of the present day.

Here is a neck of land, I may say, to use that expression, between the Mississippi River system and the great lake system, which can be spanned by sixty-five miles of canal, thereby connecting the two and affording complete water transportation from one to the other.

I do not believe I overstate it when I say that to all the States of the Northwest beyond the Mississippi River the construction of this canal will save four or five times its cost every year. I believe that it is not a local measure. Illinois is not, in my judgment, as much, certainly not more, interested in the proposition to-day than are the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, and all those States lying west of the Mississippi River.

I shall therefore most cordially give to this measure my support. I believe that it is the best regulator of railroads that can possibly be devised. We have been talking year in and year out about legislative provisions to regulate railway charges. I believe that something in that direction is practicable, and I hope before this Congress closes to see some legislation carefully matured that will regulate that subject in the interest of cheap transportation, but at the same time I believe that there is no legislative regulation that is at all comparable to that kind of regulation which operates beyond the power of combinations. By that I mean water transportation, where every man can put on his own vessel, without contributing to the great railroad combinations through the corporations that control the country.

Mr. Fink, the railroad commissioner at New York, stated a year or two ago that the Erie Canal regulates the price of freight not only along its lines but regulates it as far south as Mobile. I believe that to be true, and in this way: whenever the Erie Canal opens the railroads along its line are compelled to put down their freights; for gentlemen may say what they please as to canals having gone out of fashion and out of date, and all that kind of thing, yet it is a fact which every transporter of freight from the West knows, that whenever the Erie Canal opens the railroads along its line put down their freights very largely. I do not know what per cent., I cannot state it, but we all know that there is a very great reduction in the price of those rates.

Here lies the New York Central right alongside of the Erie Canal. Whenever that canal opens the New York Central is compelled to reduce its freights or it gets none to carry; or at least in order to secure the freights it must reduce them. When the New York Central reduces its freights the Pennsylvania Central follows suit, and the Pensylvania Central compels the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Baltimore and Ohio the Chesapeake and Ohio, and so on the influence extends, as Mr. Fink the railroad commissioner told us, as far South as Mobile.

I believe that the opening of the Hennepin Canal will regulate the price of transportation on every line of railroad almost connecting the Mississippi River with the lakes, and will regulate it without any law, without any Congressional enactment. It is a constant regulator, working all the time, and is beyond the power of combinations.

I believe the people of the West demand that these two great water systems shall be connected, and I believe that the people of New England and the East will be equally benefited by it, for whatever cheapens transportation between the great grain-growing regions of the West and the grain-consuming regions of the East is equally a benefit to both. I sincerely hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Hennepin Canal is part of a magnificent plan of constructing canals in aid of transportation. It was a part of a scheme thoroughly investigated by a committee of the Senate in 1873, a committee of which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] was chairman, and I was also a member of it. We examined into all these various schemes, but the panic of 1873 immediately followed the investigation and the whole scheme fell through. The plan contemplated an expenditure of millions of dollars for the building of canals and other aids to navigation between the waters of the great rivers and lakes.

I can state in a moment why I shall vote against the Hennepin Canal. It is to be a short canal of about sixty-five miles between Hennepin, an important town upon the Illinois River, and Rock Island, a point about sixty-five miles off. Not a single bit of the water of the Illinois River will float into this canal, nor will any water from the Mississippi float into the canal. It therefore has no connection with the two rivers; it is not in aid of the navigation of either. The building of this canal would no doubt greatly shorten the line between Chicago and the Mississippi River, because the Illinois River runs at an acute angle to the Mississippi River, and it is probably a distance of about five hundred miles from Hennepin to the point which is reached in the Mississippi.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question, for I did not understand what he has just stated? Do I understand him to say that the water of this canal will not be supplied by the Mississippi or the Illinois River?

Mr. SHERMAN. By neither. Not a drop from either river will flow through the canal.

Mr. BUTLER. Where will the water come from?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state in a moment. The canal crosses what may be called a ridge of table-land lying between the Illinois River and the Mississippi River. The Illinois River is lower at Hennepin than the Mississippi River is at Rock Island. The ascent made by the canal from Hennepin is about two hundred feet. I may not state it exactly, for I have not looked at the matter recently, but I think the ascent is from one hundred and ninety to two hundred feet, and then it falls again into the Mississippi River about one hundred and forty feet, so that the ascent is about two hundred feet and the descent is I think about one hundred and forty feet. If I am wrong about the figures I ask to be corrected.

Mr. BUTLER. The fall is ninety-one feet.

Mr. ALLISON. The rise is two hundred and seven feet.

Mr. SHERMAN. This canal is to make a shortened line between those two points across a ridge, say, two hundred and seven feet high. There will have to be twenty-eight locks constructed in the sixty-five miles. The Senator from South Carolina asks me where the water will come from to supply the canal. At the apex of this ridge, by the aid of an irrigating canal, or what is called in the bill a "feeder," about thirty or forty miles long, they strike the headwaters of Rock River, which they drain into it, and that supplies the water for feeding the canal. It is the headwaters of Rock River which is to supply the canal with water.

Mr. BUTLER. Does Rock River come right on the summit of the ridge?

Mr. SHERMAN. By the aid of this runner or feeder the water of Rock River will be brought into the canal.

Mr. BUTLER. It is to come in both directions, then, and run into the canal?

Mr. SHERMAN. Rock River lies between the Illinois River and the Mississippi River. By running from a point in the canal northward you strike Rock River. They can bring the water from Rock River into the canal and thus feed the canal with water. All the water that is to supply the canal will come from Rock River. The first objection will be, if the water is diverted from Rock River into the canal there will be at once a claim for reclamation for the lost water from Rock River to supply the canal. Rock River is a rapidly falling and a rapidly flowing stream which supplies a large number of mills with motive power. It seems to me that the first difficulty will be that we shall divert Rock River from its natural channel into a feeder for the canal and thus make a ground for the reclamation of damages.

When we were considering this matter in 1873 the estimated cost of the work, if I remember aright (and if I am wrong Senators will correct me) was about $19,000,000 or $20,000,000, of which I think about $12,000,000 was to deepen the channel and improve the navigation of what is called the Illinois and Michigan Canal, which runs from Chicago and finally into the Illinois River. The Government improves every year the Illinois River, and the State of Illinois still controls and governs the canal. It is proposed to transfer to the United States the canal with a view at some future time to have it deepened so as to be six or seven feet deep instead of its present condition, and then make this canal across the peninsula between Hennepin and the Mississippi River.

If this is regarded as an important proposition—and I have no doubt it is—it ought to be considered in a bill by itself. It has no connection with the river and harbor bill, because it is not the improvement of a river; it is rather a cut-off between two great rivers. The journey around by these two rivers would probably be about five hundred miles. If this canal were made it would make a communication across this peninsula of about sixty-five miles, and to that extent no doubt it would greatly benefit navigation. It may be a very important improvement; but it is not a pertinent or proper amendment to a river and harbor bill. It is true that in the river and harbor bills there have been other improvements which relate to short canals. There is a short canal around the falls of the Ohio, but that was merely to make an artificial channel around a natural obstruction in the Ohio River. So there is one at the Des Moines Rapids in the Mississippi River, where a canal has been built to relieve the navigation of the Mississippi River from a very serious obstruction in the Des Moines Rapids as they are called. That improvement has been made. Those aids to navigation are perfectly proper in a river and harbor bill, because they are for the improvement of the river; they furnish the river a sure and safe channel instead of one that is difficult and dangerous.

The work through Wisconsin, in my judgment, ought to have been abandoned by the Government long ago. At the time the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement was first designed it was before the great lines of railroad had been completed, and then those rivers contained much more water than they do now. It was easy to make a connection between the headwaters of these two streams, because they came within a mile or so of each other at one point, and so they made a connection across; but now they find it necessary practically to make canals of the rivers or to improve the old rivers, or to make an artificial connection practically between the Mississippi and the upper lakes. It seems to me it would be better to abandon the scheme.

Besides that, I believe if this canal was built now with the present facilities for railroads across that beautiful country, a railroad would dry up the canal; that it would make it unprofitable to navigate the canal even if it was constructed.

Since these projects were contemplated the navigation of the Mississippi River has totally changed. Instead of steamboats which were formerly the mode of transportation on that great river, barges are now used which are towed all the way down the river to New Orleans, and the wheat, &c., which is carried in those barges is shipped in vessels to eastern ports and also to Liverpool.

It seems to me now that to undertake this scheme as a mere amendment to an appropriation bill is not a wise thing to do. If it is done at all, it ought to be done as an independent proposition with ample means commensurate to the object in view. But now it is proposed to appropriate $100,000 to commence this work. Sir, it is not a fleabite in the commencement of this work; it is merely an entering-wedge. If the Government of the United States accepts the gift from the State of Illinois of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, it will accept an elephant, and it will involve undoubtedly the expense of widening and deepening the channel of that canal and the making of this canal from Hennepin to Rock Island. If this question is taken in its entirety, it will not only cost the construction of this canal but a large sum in addition to complete the navigation of the canal which is now owned by the State of Illinois.

The experience of Ohio and Indiana has shown that canals as they are now cannot compete with railroads. Probably if we had a great ship-canal between these two points it would be an enormous aid to navigation. In Ohio our experience with canals is that while formerly they were very useful, they are now of but very little value. Scarcely anything is transported on the Ohio Canal, which cost many millions of dollars. The Miami Canal from Toledo to Cincinnati is now an unimportant thoroughfare carrying only lumber and coal and heavy articles of that kind, which is no doubt convenient, but scarcely paying expenses. My colleague may know more about that, as I do not live near any of these canals, but my impression is that the canals in Ohio which cost so many million dollars barely pay the expense of maintaining them in a reasonable condition, and there is constant complaint that the private parties to whom the State of Ohio has given her canals merely to keep them in repair do not keep them in repair. The result is that they are practically superseded by railroad transportation. The Ohio Canal was a magnificent canal, second only to the Erie Canal; it extended from Cleveland on Lake Erie to Portsmouth on the Ohio, some three hundred miles, but it is now practically abandoned to merely local traffic in coal and lumber, while the railroads have gridironed the State, in some cases running right along the line of the canals and have practically taken all their business.

On the very line where it is proposed to build this canal, or near it, within a convenient distance, there are two or three important lines of railway. Some of the great railways of the West run within a short distance and on the very line it is proposed to run this canal. I am not familiar enough with the railroads of Illinois to name them, but I have been over the railroads between Chicago and Rock Island which pass through some of the very towns mentioned in this amendment.

It seems to me it is unwise now in this collateral manner to take up the question of building a ship-canal. I tell my friend from Minnesota, with whom I examined this subject nine years ago very thoroughly, that if the United States would undertake to build a great ship-canal between the city of Chicago, the most important mart of our western country, striking somewhere across to Rock Island or in that neighborhood, and build it so that tow-boats can transport flats or barges through from the Mississippi River to Chicago, it would be a great and beneficent work; but it is not a work to be entered into in this way. It ought to be considered as a subject by itself; it ought to be considered as a great line of improvement, not merely a canal of seventy feet wide on the surface of the water and six feet deep, but it ought to be considered as a ship-canal. All the estimates that were made formerly were upon the basis of the construction of a ship-canal between these points, and I am quite sure that the lowest estimate made by any engineer was $19,000,000. I think the Senator from Illinois stated that fact.

Mr. LOGAN. Eighteen million dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Eighteen millions or thereabouts. I have not looked at the figures recently.

Mr. LOGAN. That was from Chicago clear down—a ship-canal.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say the whole project was then considered as a work to extend from Chicago. This work from Hennepin to Rock Island is purely a local work. It is only valuable in connection with the greater improvement to be made from Chicago through Joliet, which, I believe, is the name of the town, to Hennepin, and then the canal from Hennepin to Rock Island must be made commensurate with the demands of trade in the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

I trust, therefore, that the amendment, which tends to obstruct the action of the Senate upon this bill, will not be agreed to. This very project was considered in the House at the present session, and I am informed by a member of the House that the committee of the House refused to put it in the bill because it was not in the true sense a river or harbor improvement, but was the entering-wedge to an important proposed improvement for the establishment of a ship-canal between Chicago and Rock Island.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as the Senator has alluded to the action of the House, if he will look at the record he will find that they came within two votes of having the requisite two-thirds vote in the House. They only lacked two votes of attaching the amendment to the bill under the rule requiring a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was a separate and distinct measure?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. On this bill?

Mr. LOGAN. On the proposition to put the measure on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a separate bill?

Mr. LOGAN. As a separate proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the way it ought to be considered.

Mr. LOGAN. I know exactly what the intention was. A two-thirds vote was required to take it up. The proposition was to add it to this bill, but it lacked two votes or a few votes of having the requisite two-thirds, and under the rule of the House they could not get it on the bill, and that is the reason why it is proposed here.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the committee of the House had reported this amendment to the bill a majorty of the House could have put it on the river and harbor bill, just as easily as a majority of the Senate can now put it on the bill.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer first this point. When this bill was pending in the House it was open to amendment like any other bill. It was debated item by item just like any other appropriation bill; and it would have been perfectly in order for them to have added this as an amendment to the appropriation bill if a majority of the committee had reported it as an amendment to the bill and a majority of the House had been in favor of it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not so under their rules, and the presiding officer so decided.

Mr. LOGAN. It was expressly declared to be out of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. That makes no difference. I do not see why if it had been reported from the committee a majority of the House could not have retained it in the bill. Their rule, I believe, is somewhat like ours. Why not leave it to stand as the House left it? Why not leave it to stand on its own merits? I do not know in this country of any canal that has been built by the United States like this. I know of several canals which have been built by the United States. There was one in Tennessee in the Tennessee River, one in the Ohio River, one in the Mississippi River; and others have been built at different places; but all of them were to carry the water of a river around a natural obstruction, and thus improved the navigation of the river at that place. I now yield to the Senator from Missouri, who wishes to make a statement.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, no little attention was paid to this matter in the Committee on Commerce. I do not propose to say what occurred there, but I call attention to lines 1159 and 1160:

> That the Secretary of War shall cause said work to be constructed in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of this act.

There is no section 1 of this act. The truth is that the canal bill was offered by the Senator from Iowa, and was just taken up and put in this bill in a body.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there is anything in that point, because there is only one section in the bill, I suppose, and it is all the first section of the bill, as there is no other section.

Mr. VEST. Then they ought not to have called it "section 1."

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Ohio I suppose will not object to my calling his attention to one or two points.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. I may have been inaccurate in some of my statements.

Mr. LOGAN. He spoke of the feeder of the canal being taken from the headwaters of Rock River.

Mr. SHERMAN. From Rock River somewhere.

Mr. LOGAN. But he spoke of the headwaters as though it would drain the river. Rock River commences in Wisconsin, and this feeder will strike it at Dixon, Illinois, away west of Chicago a great distance, in the center of the State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg leave to amend my remarks by striking out the word "head," so as to say "waters of Rock River." It does not make any difference.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes this difference: if it commenced at the source it might take all the water out of the river, but where it is to commence Rock River is quite a large river and could feed half a dozen canals without any trouble.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told on the other hand that the owners of mill rights along Rock River have remonstrated and complained that the withdrawal of the water from Rock River would impair their rights.

Mr. ALLISON. Would it disturb the Senator for me to say a word?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. The proposed canal with two hundred lockages per day, which is eighty more than the Erie Canal has to-day, will only take one-twentieth of the water out of Rock River at Dixon, so that it will have no perceptible influence upon the volume of water in Rock River. That is the fact with reference to this canal, I do not care what the pretenses of those men may be.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I know is that people along Rock River, below the place from whence this water will be drawn, say this will impair their riparian rights.

Mr. ALLISON. They say distinctly in the very paper read here to-day that their objection was upon the basis of a ship-canal, and not upon the basis of a commercial canal, as proposed by the amendment. That would of course drain a large amount of water.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is merely a canal to shorten the distance of navigation between Chicago and the Mississippi River. It is purely a local canal, not supplied by the waters of either of the rivers sought to be improved, but supplied by another stream, Rock River, which is not navigable to any considerable extent. I know what Rock River is where we cross it on the railroad and see it. As a matter of course it is not a navigable stream; it is a small stream between the Illinois and the Mississippi Rivers, and it seems to me it is not the kind of work that is contemplated by a river and harbor bill. It is one of those works that were contemplated by a magnificent scheme of canal and water navigation which was intended to be put on foot just before the panic of 1873, and which was arrested by that panic, and from that time to this has slumbered. Among the other water-ways provided for by that scheme was one to extend the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal across the mountains to reach the borders of Ohio. Another was to connect the waters of the Savannah with the waters of the Tennessee River. Another was to absorb the Erie Canal and enlarge it, and to build a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara on the south side, so as to compete with the Canadian canal on the opposite side. It was a part of a vast scheme, and the whole scheme ought to be considered together.

I therefore feel it to be my duty to vote against this amendment, although I should be perfectly willing to enter into a full and fair consideration in regard to the building of a ship-canal, if that were feasible, on this route.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Ohio was not here yesterday to have brought his support to the motion I made to reject this amendment to the bill because it was not in order under the rules of the Senate. I am glad to find that he concurs with me in the opinion that it was not in order. We could thereby have had a great economy of time on this business, and economy of time is a matter of very great public importance at this moment.

I am either old-fashioned enough or stupid enough not to find warrant in the Constitution of the United States for this legislation. It is a matter of indifference to me upon which ground it is placed; but if you put it upon the ground of my stupidity, I simply have to protect myself by a reliance upon the opinions of some of the most eminent of all the statesmen who have adorned our history. I find in the concluding sentence of this amendment an open and plain declaration by the committee of the unconstitutionality of this measure, as I read it. It is in these words:

> That the State of Illinois shall have first surrendered to the United States the improvements made by said State on the Illinois River above Hennepin and the canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and shall consent to the provisions of this act by act of her Legislature before this act shall take effect and be operative.

We are engaged in legislation here, as we call it, which we admit on the face of this amendment we have no power to make operative or effective unless with the consent of the State of Illinois. I put it to the Senate now, under the decision of the Supreme Court upon what is called the Thurman bill, whether we have the right without the consent of the State of Illinois to pass this measure? I presume that there is no answer to be made affirming that we have any such right. If, then, we have not the right to pass this legislation without the consent of the State of Illinois so as to make it operative and effective, we are engaged in a mere proposition of legislation which requires the concurrent action of another sovereign legislative power before it can have the effect of a law.

Why is it necessary to obtain the consent of the State of Illinois to this proposition before it becomes effective as a law? It is because Congress has not got the power without that consent to make it operative within the borders of that State.

That brings up another question. Can the State of Illinois by its subsequent consent, its consent hereafter to be given to legislation that we now enact, confer upon this body the constitutional power to make an enactment? The question might be in some respects different, I will not say it would or would not be, if Illinois had already made a proposition of this kind to the Congress of the United States; but for us to pass a measure which is not to become a law even after it is approved by the President, until the State of Illinois shall accept it and consent to its becoming operative, is to do a purely nugatory act, and one that we are not required to do, nor are we permitted to do it, by the Constitution of the United States. An enactment to be complete must be complete at the time it receives the signature of approval by the President of the United States. It becomes an act of Congress from that date, operative and effective, else it is no act of Congress, but a mere proposition of legislation.

The point I make rests upon the broad constitutional proposition that the State of Illinois has no power to confer jurisdiction upon the Congress of the United States to do anything. She may or may not consent to the operation of certain laws within her borders under certain circumstances, but she cannot confer upon the Congress of the United States the power and the jurisdiction to make this enactment or any other enactment; yet we declare that this measure shall not take effect and be operative until we obtain the consent of the State of Illinois.

Mr. President, I am curious to know upon which of the powers given to the Congress of the United States in the Constitution the right to make a canal within the borders of a State is to be vested. Some Senators say it is upon the power to regulate commerce; others say that it is upon the power to provide for the general welfare. I believe the majority of opinion, so far as it has been expressed on this occasion, undertakes to rest this legislation upon the power to regulate commerce. That is supposed to be the basis of our right to spend these many millions of dollars, as some say amounting to $10,000,000 in the outcome, for the purpose of building a canal within the State of Illinois. I wish to inquire for a moment on this point, not expecting, however, to get the attention of the Senate to a matter that is so old-fashioned and out of time and out of place as the discussion of a constitutional question. I will address myself to the reporters, of course, and to the country through them. The power to regulate commerce as it is given in the Constitution reads thus:

The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

I will not stop to enter into a disquisition here upon the meaning of the words "to regulate commerce." Whether the phrase means to create avenues of commerce, channels of commerce, and vehicles of commerce, or whether it means to regulate the manner of conducting commerce, is a question that I have my opinions about, but I shall not detain and worry the Senate by any expression of them on this occasion. However, by looking at section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution, we find something else on the subject of the regulation of commerce, and to it I should like to invite the attention of some of the gentlemen who profess to be Democrats in the Senate, and who profess to have followed heretofore the views which the leaders of that party in many years past have espoused and advocated before the country:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Every act of Congress which undertakes to regulate commerce is subject to that restraining qualification in the sixth clause of section 9 of article 1 of the Constitution. The eighth section provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce," but by the ninth section "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." If in your effort to regulate commerce either by building a canal or by building a railroad, or in any other respect, you must necessarily give a preference to the ports of one State over those of another, you exercise that power in a manner which is prohibited under the Constitution in express terms. I shall not detain the Senate by any elaboration of that proposition. The statement of it carries its own logical force, and carries it in a manner that I think no Senator will venture to deny, but I will apply it for a moment to the provisions of this proposed law.

The commerce of the Upper Mississippi finds its way upon the vehicles of commerce, barges, steamers, or whatever they may be, and floats on down with the current of that stream until it strikes Rock Island. The Congress of the United States interposes at that point, and to prevent that commerce from going through that stream to its proper, natural exit into the sea, it constructs a canal for the purpose of carrying that commerce from the Mississippi River across to Lake Michigan, and it is said that that is a regulation of commerce. Sir, it is a regulation with a vengeance. It is a regulation which deprives the Mississippi of its legitimate commerce, and the towns and cities and ports that are upon the Mississippi River of their legitimate rights to that commerce as guaranteed in the Constitution, for here is an express guarantee, and it turns the commerce away from its natural flow as it was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, to a port of another State, thereby making a clear and undeniable discrimination against the ports which may be upon the Mississippi River, and which had the right naturally and under the Constitution to enjoy that commerce.

There never was in any bill framed or sent before a Congress a more particular and definite and a more closely designed measure for the purpose of diverting the commerce from the Mississippi River and carrying it to Chicago than is found in this amendment to the pending bill. A project existed, and has been reported upon, it seems, to dig a ship-canal across to connect the waters of the Mississippi with the waters of Lake Michigan. That has been abandoned. Some other projects were also devised for the purpose of regulating commerce between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan, for that is the whole of it. Finally, the friends of this measure have come down to the proposition as presented in this amendment, which contains the singular limitation that—

Said canal and said branch shall not be less than 70 feet wide at the water-line, and not less than 6 feet in depth of water, with locks not less than 150 feet in length and 21 feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least two hundred and eighty tons burden.

In other words, it is limited that it shall be a canal for the accommodation merely of ordinary canal-boats, ordinary barges, not built with sufficient strength or capacity even to warrant them to be carried out on the Mississippi. When one of these barges is turned from the Mississippi River into this canal, and through that canal down through the Illinois River to Chicago, what becomes of the traffic there, and what is the meaning of this amendment in that particular? You might just as well have said in the measure, in order to make it entirely specific, these barges shall there be unloaded by elevators, and the grain carried into steamers or schooners or sloops. That is the purpose of it; no man can deny it. You must break bulk at Chicago.

Therefore the measure is designed and intended also, yes expressly designed and expressly intended, to draw the commerce from the Mississippi River, carry it in barges to Chicago, where it must be unloaded, and there is but one port in the United States that can receive the benefit of this legislation, and that is the port of Chicago. That is an undeniable proposition; and if it be true, what becomes of that restraint upon your power that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over the ports of another?"

Here you pass a bill with the express intention and purpose to giving that preference. It is so plain that no one can deny that that is the purpose; and yet with this restraining clause in the Constitution upon the exercise of the power to regulate commerce, as it is called, we give a preference to Chicago over New Orleans, which is intended to take the grain that floats down the Mississippi River away from New Orleans and carry it to Chicago.

That argument, it seems to me, ought to be sufficient to show that the digging of a canal is not a regulation of commerce. If we can plant canals where we please, and where we can get the water to supply them, if we can carry them so as to discriminate against one port of the United States and in favor of another port, and if we can exercise the power in that way and call it a regulation of commerce, Congress being the supreme judge of what is right and what is wrong in such matters, we can wipe the Constitution entirely out of the way. I know there would not be much objection to doing that in a great many quarters. I know that that instrument has gone into disuse, and a man can scarcely claim to be respectable who in this day and time avows his adhesion to its true principles and a determination to support it.

The term "regulation of commerce" in the Constitution of the United States never had reference to the construction of a canal or the building of a railway, nor did it have any reference either to the cleaning out of a river. That is not a regulation of commerce; it is providing additional facilities for commerce; that is the whole of it. That phrase was never used in the Constitution of the United States at the time it was ordained with respect to the idea that it should open in any latitudinarian sense, or in any sense indeed, the power to Congress to take money taxed out of the people for the purpose of building vehicles or channels of commerce. It never was so intended. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution so much of the Mississippi River as belonged to us, like all the rest of the great streams of this country, was included in its provisions. A port upon that river within our dominion, like a port upon the Hudson River within our dominion, is within the protection of the sixth clause of the ninth section of the first article of that instrument, and we have no right to take those ports and places, those natural channels of commerce, and in undertaking to improve them or in undertaking to enlarge their capacity, or in any other thing we may undertake about them, to discriminate between the ports of one State and the ports of another.

What protection have the States against the use of this power in this unlawful, this illegitimate way, unless we confine ourselves to the requirements and the mandates of the Constitution on this subject? Sir, we have no protection. For one I am not in favor of abandoning the protection that the Constitution gives to the ports of every State in this Union. It is an absolute guarantee, and one that we have no right to waive or to fritter away.

I have been looking over General Jackson's veto of the Maysville Road bill, and it has occurred to me that it might be somewhat an affliction upon the Senate to hear a part of it read, but still perhaps it is due to the country that the people should have an opportunity of refreshing themselves at that fountain of wisdom and patriotism, for I confess that I have the greatest respect not only for the character of the man but for his wisdom as a statesman and an expounder of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question for the purpose of being sure that I understand him?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator mean to say that he thinks it beyond the power of Congress under the Constitution to so legislate as to turn the commerce of the country from what may be to-day its most natural channel to some other port? For instance, does he think it a violation of the Constitution to charter a railroad which should divert the internal commerce of the country, say to the port of San Francisco, rather than permit it to go down the river to New Orleans or to find transit to some eastern port? Would he consider that as a discrimination in favor of the port of any particular State or States?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from New Hampshire should claim a power of this kind under the provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the right to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, I would then quote to him simply the language of the other provision which I have already read, that in the exercise of that power we must not give a preference to the ports of one State over those of another.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that very well. The Senator does not answer my question in asking another and a very different one or raising a supposition as to my advancing a proposition which I have not done. I was asking for information myself. I understood the Senator to say substantially that it is a violation of that provision of the Constitution which prohibits a discrimination in favor of the ports of one State over those of another for Congress to authorize the construction of this canal, for instance, thus affording an avenue for the commerce of the Northwest to the eastern shore of the continent, rather than pursuing its way down the Mississippi River, which is, perhaps, its natural water channel. I ask the Senator if it is a fair construction of that provision of the Constitution to say that general legislation opening new avenues for general commerce either by land or water, having that paramount purpose in view, is to be considered specially with reference to the provision prohibiting discrimination in favor of the ports of particular States? Does he not in so doing, in other words, make the incidental improvement or the avenue of a port subservient to the great ends of the promotion of avenues or the creation of avenues for the commerce of the country? Does he not make the incident superior to the principal thing?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States under the power to regulate commerce has the right to build a railroad or to build a canal. If it has that right at all, it is under some other power of the Constitution.

Mr. BLAIR. Would the Senator be so kind as to state under what power it is, unless under that of regulating commerce as between the States or commerce generally, that the United States may charter a railroad company or construct a railroad having connections with more than one State?

Mr. MORGAN. The Congress of the United States has a jurisdiction which is qualified and limited by the territory within which it is to operate. By the express terms of the Constitution it is made the legislative tribunal for the unorganized Territories of the United States, and by all the acts we have passed it has the right of control so far as to repeal the legislation of Territories that we may organize. It has exclusive right of legislation also for the District of Columbia and other places that I could mention. Within that area the power of the Congress of the United States to legislate carries with it the right to legislate upon any subject that Congress may legitimately take into its jurisdiction. It may be that within the Territories under this power to legislate for and to dispose of the Territories, Congress would have the right to charter a railroad company, or to build a railroad perhaps, to apply the money of the people of the United States to it. It is not necessary that I should discuss a question that is so far away from this subject as that, at this moment of time, but I affirm that I do not believe the power to regulate commerce conveys the right to build railways or to build canals. I do not believe that the power to provide for the general welfare conveys that authority to Congress. It is not my conviction that Congress has any right to dispose of money taxed out of the people for any other than a governmental purpose.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, then, if I am to understand that he denies the power of Congress to regulate commerce, except it may be in the Territories, and exclusive of its relation among the States?

Mr. MORGAN. I deny that it is in the power of Congress to regulate commerce by building a railroad or by building a canal. Regulate it by passing laws which require that commerce shall be conducted in a certain way; regulate it by fixing the proper dues for all commerce, but do not regulate it by employing horses and teamsters and having them haul freight back and forth, as is to be done in this measure, from Hennepin to Rock Island, and that, too, without any compensation, for there is no compensation provided here for the service. That is no regulation of commerce. You might as well undertake to regulate the management of the drays in the streets of the city of Washington, and call that a regulation of commerce, or in the streets of the city of New York, and call that a regulation of commerce.

You had just as well undertake to pass an act of Congress to unlock the strike between the freight-handlers and the railway companies in the city of New York, and claim that to be a regulation of commerce by the facilitation of the carrying on of commerce. That idea is not included in what our fathers had in their minds at the time they put these ordinances into this instrument. The power to regulate commerce is not the power to create the instrumentalities by which commerce shall be carried on. If so, you can build steamships, and freight them under the direction of the officers of the United States, and carry on commerce with foreign powers. I do not think that these words have any such construction, or admit of it, and the reason why I do not think so is because the other words which are found in the eighth section of the first article are qualified in the manner that I have already called the attention of the Senate to in the ninth section and in the sixth clause thereof.

I now ask the Secretary to read the part that I have marked of the message of President Jackson vetoing the Maysville road bill, on the 27th of May, 1830.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

The constitutional power of the Federal Government to construct or promote works of internal improvement presents itself in two points of view: the first, as bearing upon the sovereignty of the States within whose limits their execution is contemplated, if jurisdiction of the territory which they may occupy be claimed as necessary to their preservation and use; the second, as asserting the simple right to appropriate money from the national Treasury in aid of such works when undertaken by State authority surrendering the claim of jurisdiction. In the first view, the question of power is an open one, and can be decided without the embarrassment attending the other, arising from the practice of the Government. Although frequently and strenuously attempted, the power to this extent has never been exercised by the Government in a single instance. It does not, in my opinion, possess it; and no bill, therefore, which admits it can receive my official sanction.

But in the other view of the power the question is differently situated. The ground taken at an early period of the Government was, "that whenever money has been raised by the general authority, and is to be applied to a particular measure, a question arises whether the particular measure be within the enumerated authorities vested in Congress. If it be, the money requisite for it may be applied to it; if not, no such application can be made." The document in which this principle was first advanced is of deservedly high authority, and should be held in grateful remembrance for its immediate agency in rescuing the country from much existing abuse, and for its conservative effect upon some of the most valuable principles of the Constitution.

The symmetry and purity of the Government would doubtless have been better preserved if this restriction of the power of appropriation could have been maintained without weakening its ability to fulfill the general objects of its institution—an effect so likely to attend its admission, notwithstanding its apparent fitness, that every subsequent administration of the Government, embracing a period of thirty out of the forty-two years of its existence, has adopted a more enlarged construction of the power. It is not my purpose to detain you by a minute recital of the acts which sustain this assertion, but it is proper that I should notice some of the most prominent, in order that the reflections which they suggest to my mind may be better understood.

In the administration of Mr. Jefferson we have two examples of the exercise of the right of appropriation, which, in the considerations that led to their adoption, and in their effects upon the public mind, have had a greater agency in marking the character of the power than any subsequent events. I allude to the payment of $15,000,000 for the purchase of Louisiana, and to the original appropriation for the construction of the Cumberland road; the latter act deriving much weight from the acquiescence and approbation of three of the most powerful of the original members of the confederacy, expressed through their respective Legislatures. Although the circumstances of the latter case may be such as to deprive so much of it as relates to the actual construction of the road of the force of an obligatory exposition of the Constitution, it must nevertheless be admitted that so far as the mere appropriation of money is concerned, they present the principle in its most imposing aspect. No less than twenty-three different laws have been passed through all the forms of the Constitution, appropriating upward of two millions and a half of dollars out of the national Treasury in support of that improvement, with the approbation of every President of the United States, including my predecessor, since its commencement.

Independently of the sanction given to appropriations for the Cumberland and other roads and objects under this power, the administration of Mr. Madison was characterized by an act which furnishes the strongest evidence of his opinion of its extent. A bill was passed through both Houses of Congress and presented for his approval, "setting apart and pledging certain funds for constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions for the common defense." Regarding the bill as asserting a power in the Federal Government to construct roads and canals within the limits of the States in which they were made, he objected to its passage on the ground of its unconstitutionality, declaring that the assent of the respective States in the mode provided by the bill could not confer the power in question; that the only cases in which the consent and cession of particular States can extend the power of Congress are those specified and provided for in the Constitution; and superadding to these avowals his opinion that a restriction of the power "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money, would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of government, money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution. I have not been able to consider these declarations in any other point of view than as a concession that the right of appropriation is not limited by the power to carry into effect the measure for which the money is asked, as was formerly contended.

The views of Mr. Monroe upon this subject were not left to inference. During his administration a bill was passed through both Houses of Congress conferring the jurisdiction and prescribing the mode by which the Federal Government should exercise it in the case of the Cumberland road. He returned it with objections to its passage, and in assigning them took occasion to say that in the early stages of the Government he had inclined to the construction that it had no right to expend money except in the performance of acts authorized by the other specific grants of power, according to a strict construction of them; but that on further reflection and observation his mind had undergone a change; that his opinion then was: "That Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriation they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defense and of general, not local, national, not State, benefit;" and this was avowed to be the governing principle through the residue of his administration. The views of the last Administration are of such recent date as to render a particular reference to them unnecessary. It is well known that the appropriating power, to the utmost extent which had been claimed for it in relation to internal improvements, was fully recognized and exercised by it.—Jackson's Maysville Road Veto. The Statesman's Manual, volume 2, pages 816–818.

Mr. MORGAN. General Jackson was not an illiberal man in his views of the Constitution. He was a broader and more catholic man in his views than a great many of his followers who have professed to esteem him very highly. The doctrines which he lays down in the message I have just asked to be read, fortified, as they are, by references to the opinions of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe, ought to be safe guides for men in this day and time; and the further we get away from the period at which he uttered them the more necessity we find for their application to the affairs of this generation.

We are admonished now that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] intends to offer an amendment to this proposition for the building of a ship-canal between the Chesapeake and the Delaware, a very large project and perhaps one that may be of interest to the entire people of the United States, or it may not be of any account to anybody. I am not prepared to give any opinion on that subject. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] yesterday offered an amendment for the survey of a ship-canal across the peninsula of Florida. I dare say that other Senators have in their minds now projects that they expect to bring forward, such, for instance, as opening an inland line of communication from Norfolk far down on the coast of North and even South Carolina; other Senators probably have projects in their minds for the connection of the waters of the Tennessee with the waters of the Alabama River, and also for connecting the waters of the Alabama River with those of the Savannah and other rivers in the South and Southwest. There is no end to the schemes that are now working in the minds of Senators, based upon the proposition that Congress can assume to itself the right to tax the people of the United States at large for the building of these works, as they are called, of internal improvement. These measures are already mapped out; many of them have been written about by persons who suppose themselves to be particularly informed in reference thereto. Magazines and newspapers and briefs and pamphlets are circulated through the country at large for the purpose of encouraging the building of these numerous and very expensive schemes of internal improvement.

The Congress of the United States has not yet deliberately placed itself upon record in the act of building a canal to connect the navigable waters of one river which is navigable with another river or a lake which is navigable. I do not remember, at least, that any scheme of that sort, even a mile long, has received the sanction of Congress.

There is an attentive country looking on at this moment while we are breaking ground upon this very important question, and it will not do for us lightly to estimate the consequences of the passage of this bill if this amendment should prevail. The Congress of the United States will for the next fifty years, if our prosperity continues, be engaged in levying taxes upon the people of the United States at large for the benefit of certain localities who may be able through their membership in both Houses to effect certain combinations which will be found to be always requisite for carrying these schemes into effect. Now, sir, I trust that Senators who are engaged in the effort to put this amendment on this bill will not find fault with me if I say that this is in the nature of a combination, for that is the way it strikes my mind. This measure if reported as a bill by itself and allowed to stand, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggested, purely upon its merits and disconnected with any other measure whatsoever, would receive a much more impartial consideration than it can possibly do upon an appropriation bill. The bill was reported by the Committee on Commerce to the Senate, and, as I observed yesterday, we had the right to expect that the Committee on Commerce would not recall its bill from the Senate and undertake to place it as an amendment on an appropriation bill, that the Committee on Commerce in submitting this question to the Senate upon their responsibity as a committee were willing to have it considered separate and apart from all other measures of legislation. It certainly is of sufficient magnitude in warranting the Senate to enter upon that as a separate subject of legislation disconnected from all others. The value of the precedent, if nothing else, connected with this question would be of sufficient importance to require us to consider it alone, to consider it by itself; and it seems to me that it is a duty that the Senate owes to the country always to take the consideration of great measures like this under such circumstances as that they shall be able to pronounce an impartial judgment upon the measure to the country and that the country will be willing to receive it in that light.

But, sir, after the bill was reported it was recalled to the committee, and the committee have fastened it upon an appropriation bill. Now, what does that mean? Here is an appropriation bill which, without this scheme, has about nineteen and a half millions of money in it, and there is not a section of the United States which is not directly interested in the passage of this appropriation bill. If this measure can be fastened upon this general appropriation bill as an amendment it draws to itself the influence and the support of every proposition that is in the bill besides, numbering some hundreds. I submit to the Senate of the United States if this is a proper way in which to consider this novel measure, this initial project for the spending of untold millions of money to be taxed out of the people of this country.

I must be pardoned, Mr. President, and I hope that the imputation of being a demagogue will not be cast on me by any Senator within the sound of my voice if I express some solicitude for those who bear the burdens of taxation in this country. If there is a duty resting on me which I value more highly than another, it is that I shall exercise the power vested in me as a Senator, so far as it is connected with the taxation of the people, with great deliberation and caution, and that I will not pervert the powers of the Government by a construction of my own so as to authorize me to place burdens upon their necks that they cannot shake off in a century to come, and which may bring want and perhaps death into many a family in this land.

I cannot shut my eyes to considerations of this kind. One hundred thousand dollars is the sum of money said to be appropriated in this amendment. Do the Committee on Commerce expect to escape a public judgment that may hereafter come up by alluding to the fact that $100,000 only is appropriated by this amendment, when they say that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, "and he is hereby authorized and directed," is the language, "to survey, lay out, and construct a canal" sixty-five miles in length, about which there is a difference of opinion whether it will cost $4,000,000 or $20,000,000?

Mr. ALLISON. Is not that true in respect to nearly every item in this bill? If we were to act with reference to the future appropriations that are to follow the several appropriations in this bill there would be fifty or one hundred millions in the bill now lying on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. The honorable Senator speaks to me as if he thought I was responsible for something in this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not a member of the Committee on Commerce, nor have I voted for one of these appropriation bills since I have been in this body; never. I have found them transgressing on all grounds the rights and powers and duties of Congress and placing burdens on the people of the United States that in my solemn judgment are utterly illegitimate. I have taken occasion sometimes to express my opinions about matters of this kind, when they were received without the slightest approbation of my colleagues in this body. I deem that this bill throughout in almost all of its provisions, certainly in a great many of its provisions, is a transgression of Congress against the people; it is an abuse of the taxing power of the country which men who get contracts and who are wealthy and who transport commerce from place to place and who receive the dividends and profits of the interchange of commerce, middlemen and capitalists, do not feel. The poor laboring men, the toiling people of this country feel it; yes, sir, they feel it wofully. It has happened to me in my experience in life that I know exactly what it costs for a poor man to earn a dollar of money, and knowing that I must be excused if I have some sympathy with the men who in this country have to toil to pay the taxes that we so lavishly waste upon works that are called works of internal improvement.

I believe that Congress has not followed its duty in guarding and protecting the people against this enormous taxation, for it is nothing else. This bill might just as well be entitled a bill to tax the people twenty millions of money to build works, so called, of public improvement as to call it a bill for the development of the resources of the country or "for the improvement of rivers and harbors," for this bill is worth nothing unless it is supported by the money the people have to pay in the form of taxation, and we should remember while we are doing this that there are guarantees in the Constitution, and more than that, there are guarantees of good faith that ought to keep us very closely restricted to the duties we owe to the country as far as we may be able to for its commercial wants, not to launch out into these lavish schemes of improvement that are meant to benefit one single town, perhaps, or one single section of the country at the expense of all the rest.

The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to-day boasted that his State was out of debt. I was glad to hear him say so. But, sir, living in a State that is in debt, a State that has to tax her people enormously for the purpose of paying debts that they never contracted, and that never were honestly due from her people, I must confess that I feel some reluctance to having my people taxed a dollar to build a great work of internal improvement in a State that does not owe a dollar. That magnificent empire, I may call it, the State of Illinois, with its wonderful Queen City seated upon Lake Michigan, commanding the commerce of all that great line of water communication, backed by an area of territory the fertility of which is beyond that of the Delta of the Nile, out of debt, is willing to give us a canal that cost over six millions of money provided we will tax ourselves and our people twelve or twenty millions, as the case may be, for no man knows what is to be the outcome, to build a line of water communication there which will conveniently garner all the grain that comes from the northern Mississippi, and cut it off from New Orleans, and prevent New Orleans from having any access to it at all after you have built this national line of intercommunication.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there to say to him that I think if he will examine the records in reference to taxation he will find that the State which I represent is not asking other States to be taxed very much for her benefit; the benefit comes from us. The State of Illinois alone pays sixteen millions of taxes annually on one article to the United States Government.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that whisky?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad to hear that it is all consumed there, for Illinois whisky has not got a very good reputation in the South, and I am glad to hear they drink it in Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference about its reputation. Illinois pays more taxes on two articles to the United States Government than—I will not say half a dozen States like the Senator's, for I will not make that remark—but it pays more taxes in one year for the benefit of your people than your people ever will pay in twenty-five years for the benefit of Illinois.

Mr. MORGAN. Still I cannot believe the State of Illinois drinks sixteen million dollars' worth of whisky in a year; I cannot believe that. Some other State must buy it and must consume it, naturally, necessarily, or otherwise Illinois is the worst drinking State we have. I do not believe that about Illinois. I dare say her whisky finds markets all over the United States and foreign markets also, and her industry in the distillation of whisky is very greatly prized by the outside world, and is contributed to with a benevolence and generosity that the Senator does not seem to appreciate, for while she makes the whisky the balance of the world drinks it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator is correct in saying that the State I in part represent asks other States to contribute for her benefit, when he makes that statement let him show what his State contributes to the United States Government, and make the comparison; and if he does he will see how the case stands. I see that I was mistaken in the statement that I made. My State contributes in that one article $23,000,000 a year, and one little city of 30,000 inhabitants contributes in four months' taxation enough to build this whole canal.

Mr. MORGAN. If Illinois contributes $23,000,000 a year on whisky, I am afraid that Alabama pays $3,000,000, for unfortunately we buy $3,000,000 of Illinois whisky in a year.

Mr. LOGAN. That may be, but that is the tax we pay on the production.

Mr. MORGAN. It is our misfortune to be poor. It is not a crime on our part.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will understand me; I am not calling in question the poverty or richness of anybody.

Mr. MORGAN. We are not ashamed of being poor.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not suppose you are; but I want the Senator to understand when he talks about contributions being made by other States for improvements in my State that that is very far fetched when he comes to examine the amount of taxes the State of Illinois pays to the Government of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt Illinois will pay her own quota of this taxation and Alabama will pay her quota, and so of all the other States of the Union. I was not complaining that Illinois was able to do it. I was rejoicing in that fact. I was complaining that Alabama is not able to contribute anything. I wish she were richer than she is; and if you would not pass these unjust laws discriminating against her and putting additional burdens of taxation, if you would give her a chance to live, in a few years we should be as rich as Illinois, perhaps richer too; but with these yokes and burdens on us I do not know when we shall ever be worth anything. I am trying to get for my State a chance to live, and while the honorable Senator has his State in such an excellent condition as to be able to boast here that it pays $23,000,000 a year taxation upon a single article to the Government of the United States, it seems to me he ought to forbear, at least for a while, taxing the rest of the country out of even a shilling for the building of this canal through the bosom of his own State.

I am not quarreling with the Senator from Illinois for taking care of his own people. I rather admire his genius and ability as exhibited in this proposition in that particular, for allow me to ask what part of the commerce of New Orleans that comes from Texas, or from Alabama, or from South America, or from the Caribbean Sea, or from the West India Islands, can be carried upon any vehicle of commerce that the Senator can now name from New Orleans to Chicago through this canal that you propose to construct. There will never be one boat loaded at New Orleans with products of that country to be landed in Chicago over this canal. It is a physical impossibility, and so designed in the measure. The canal is constructed so that it will accommodate nothing but little barges; no steamer can run through it, and New Orleans will never have the opportunity of selling one pound or one dollar's worth of her productions in the harbor of Chicago through the instrumentality of this canal; and yet you call it an international enterprise.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me a word right there. I do not know that I am better informed on this subject than he is; perhaps I am not as well; but these broad statements sometimes carry very erroneous impressions. I suppose the Senator certainly understands that on the Mississippi River to-day there are large barge lines carrying goods from Saint Louis to New Orleans, and the very system of barge lines established there has been done within a very few years. The very barges to-day are taken in tow from Saint Louis to New Orleans, and from New Orleans back to Saint Louis, which are going to be the great carriers of heavy freight on the Mississippi River hereafter in my judgment. To-day they pass up the Illinois River and through the Illinois and Michigan Canal to Chicago.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no difficulty in Chicago sending anything she wishes to New Orleans through this canal, but there is a difficulty that is insuperable in New Orleans loading a canal-boat to go to Chicago through this canal with sugar or anything else that she may have to contribute to the commerce of that section of the country.

Mr. LOGAN. Why?

Mr. MORGAN. The difficulty is that you cannot get a barge that will stand a tow up the Mississippi River of the dimensions mentioned in this bill unless you build it of steel or iron. The barges that go through this canal, I am credibly informed—I do not know about that myself—are not of sufficient tonnage to warrant their being hauled by tugs from the mouth of the Mississippi River. That is my information.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that I have known what are called canal-boats start right at Chicago and go down the Mississippi River and come back again heavily laden. That is of frequent occurrence. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MORGAN. I may be mistaken in that statement. I made it on the authority of another gentleman.

Mr. LOGAN. I have known canal-boats right where I was raised, in Southern Illinois, to go to Chicago through the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the Illinois River, and to come back and go down the Mississippi River, on which I was raised. I have seen them loaded with lumber, and towed back again and come back to the place whence they started time and again, years ago. That was done over and over again right from my own home.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator if these canal barges came back loaded?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, loaded with lumber. They took it right from the mills where I was raised, took it to Saint Louis and to Chicago, and went back and forth. The Senator is mistaken. There is no difficulty about the boats going up and down the Mississippi heavily laden. He is certainly very much mistaken about that.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it is a matter beyond dispute that the intention of this amendment is simply to provide for carrying the grain and other products of the Northern Mississippi to Chicago. If there was any purpose to carry to New Orleans we should have a different direction to the canal. Where is the use of running from Chicago over to Rock Island and then down the Mississippi River, and to reach Chicago going back by the same route of commerce, and call that a facilitation of commerce? What would you do in competition with railroads with a canal adequate to commerce from New Orleans?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator talks of going back to New Orleans through this canal. It would not have to go through this canal at all, but boats would come up the Illinois River from New Orleans to La Salle and through the Illinois and Michigan Canal. The boats that would go through this canal would be the Upper Mississippi boats; they would come down the Mississippi and then go through the canal up to Chicago. The Southern Mississippi boats would come up the Illinois River.

Mr. MORGAN. Then that proves the proposition for which I am contending. There is an open water-way now from Chicago to New Orleans, as I understand the Senator, partly by canal and partly by river. That is a sufficient water-way to supply all the commerce of the Lower Mississippi River, I suppose, between Chicago and New Orleans, or any other part below the point of entrance of the Ohio River into the Mississippi. Therefore this amendment is not intended to increase or to advantage the commerce of the Lower Mississippi or of any part of the Mississippi River below Rock Island.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me to say that I have been up and down from Chicago in barges, and I never saw a loaded barge come back from New Orleans? I think they go down loaded and come back empty. The current carries them down; and I have seen great numbers of barges, a quarter of a mile long, carried by one little tug; but they come back empty.

Mr. MORGAN. I am therefore safe in my proposition, on the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky, that the purpose of this canal is to assist in getting the commerce of the Northern Mississippi River into Chicago. That is the whole of it. We may as well be plain about it. I suppose the Senator from Illinois does not deny it.

Mr. LOGAN. That is where the commerce of the Northern Mississippi goes and you cannot change that by any character of legislation. But the question is whether you are going to have those people compelled to pay the high rates they are forced to pay now, or whether you will give them facilities in competition with the railroads that will give them a chance to make a profit on their products. You cannot change the commerce of the Northern Mississippi any way you may fix it. You may force them, however, to transport by rail. That is what you do by your objection here—force them to pay extraordinary prices. It has no influence so far as changing the commerce is concerned. It is only to cheapen transportation and give a water line, as I stated, to the East instead of forcing everybody to have exorbitant prices taxed on his products by the railroads.

So far as barges coming up the Mississippi River are concerned, I do not know anything more than I stated, that where I was raised I have seen them go up the Mississippi River and be towed up laden. I have seen that, and know it to be a fact, because I have gone to Saint Louis on them myself when I was a boy. Whether they can or cannot come up the Mississippi laden is not the fault of the canal, but the fault of the Mississippi River, I suppose. Now, you propose to fix the Mississippi River so that they can come up. Is not that the proposition on this bill? They cannot do it now, but it is proposed to fix it so that they can do it, so that you can take any kind of a boat or barge or steamboat, or anything else there; but you propose that the barges which can go as far as Saint Louis shall stop there and not go any farther. Is that the idea? If it is not I should like to understand the proposition. I want to open this so that they can go on up the Illinois River to Chicago or go around by way of this canal from the northern Mississippi to Chicago. We want water transportation both ways.

Mr. MORGAN. It does not occur to me that it is one of the decrees of Providence that the commerce of the Upper Mississippi is obliged to go to Chicago.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not a decree of Providence, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that is indisputable.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a fact which Chicago has a right to enjoy. I do not envy her the benefit of that fact if it exists, and I would not take from her a single opportunity to preserve it and to increase it and increase the advantages which she derives from it; but when we come to what Providence has done for this continent, we find the Mississippi flowing from the northern lakes down to the Gulf of Mexico, and whatever commerce belongs to that river it seems to me it is the duty of Congress to provide that it shall remain there rather than that it shall be diverted from it. I do not understand that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to take from a river like the Hudson, for instance, or the Alabama, or the Mississippi, commerce that naturally and legitimately belongs to it, and divert it by the expenditure of the people's money into some other channel. That is carrying the doctrine a little too far, and that is the proposition in this measure: that it is the duty of Congress to make commerce between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan cheaper by building a water-way where none exists now. That is carrying the doctrine to what we might call a romantic extent.

Mr. LOGAN. If that is the proposition of the Senator I will ask him a question. Take his own State, where Providence, as he says, has decreed that a river shall run through it that steamboats cannot pass up. Why is it that he tries to change the decrees of Providence and appropriate money to make it so that boats can go up? That is changing the course of commerce, is it not. Why do that?

Mr. MORGAN. We do not change the course of it. We make a better accommodation for commerce in the course that Providence designed for it, if you have Providence at work.

Mr. LOGAN. If Providence did not give you water enough to run your boats down there, Providence did not design any such thing. If Providence designed it Providence would have put the water there. You propose to improve on Providence by some of the appropriations for rivers in your State. If you have a little creek down there that a boat cannot run up you propose to dig it out so that a boat can run up. If we propose to cut a channel so that boats can come to our towns, it is unconstitutional and not in accordance with the decrees of Providence. I cannot understand that argument.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no occasion for pleading guilty to any such charge as that brought against me by the Senator from Illinois, for I have always voted that while we might furnish facilities for those streams that were navigable and so considered at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and so provided for in a law that was enacted almost contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, I never have adhered to the doctrine, nor have I advocated it on any occasion, of making navigation where none existed and where it was absolutely impossible. I have never done so.

There is a proposition which has received credit in the Congress of the United States almost without dispute, that where a natural barrier intervenes in a river that is navigable above and below the barrier for such vehicles of commerce as we are in the habit of using in the transportation of our productions from one place to another, Congress has the right to remove that barrier. That is a doctrine which has always obtained here, yet it has never obtained here upon my authority as a Senator.

I have not even voted for that, for it is my belief that the States themselves, if they would go to work and raise money out of their own people by taxation for improving their own harbors and their own rivers in the interior of their States, would benefit themselves and the country, and especially their own people, very much indeed. I believe if you take the $20,000,000 that are in this bill and distribute it equitably among the States of this Union to-day, they would make a better use of it than Congress will in the improvement of their internal means of intercommunication. It is the money of the people, after all; we tax it out of them; it does not grow in the Treasury; it does not descend upon it like the manna from heaven; it comes through the toil and sweat of the people, and if we relieve them of their taxation and allow them to have a chance to enjoy the prosperity that really and legitimately belongs to them, we shall find these States springing up with power in their hands to improve their internal navigation, with such wisdom of expenditure and such economy as would startle this country and be a great blessing to it. But then I am in a current which I cannot stem, and I am obliged to follow along the precedents which have been established for me. I do not propose to set myself against the volume of authority and opinion of the people of the United States so often expressed and in so many appropriation bills. I confine myself to this to-day.

I remember the men who furnish the money; I remember the tyranny of the taxing power when it is used illegitimately; I dread to employ it, and I must be conservative in the use of it, and I do not feel that there is any necessity resting upon me now to vote a bill to assist as rich a State as Illinois out of the meager contribution that the people of Alabama are able to make in their poverty and distress at this time to build this canal, even if I believed it was constitutional. I think the Senator would do justice to his State and us also if he would forbear to press this proposition until the Southern States get into a better position of prosperity than they are now. A light burden now is a terrible thing to us. We are now almost in a condition where the last feather is about to break the back of the camel. We are struggling and striving and doing all that men can do; we are refusing to pay our judges and other State officers anything like decent salaries; our State expenses are cut down to the lowest possible grade in order that we can contribute something to the school fund; and any increase of taxation is a great burden to us, and any relief from taxation is an unpronounceable advantage and relief to us; so that the Senator must not consider that we are either straight-laced or parsimonious when we refuse to be taxed by our own votes for measures of this kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. If the debate is closed upon this amendment, with a view to test the sense of the Senate, I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I appeal to the senator from Alabama to permit a direct vote on my amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I will not make the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Secretary to report my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

Mr. BUTLER. I have made a slight modification.

THE ACTING SECRETARY. In line 1091, after the word "surveys," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and to insert:

> The cost of construction, the annual cost of maintenance, and the economy of use of said canal when completed, shall be estimated and accompany said surveys.

Then it is proposed to strike out from line 1108 to line 1193, inclusive, and in line 1194, after the word "dollars," to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say a word with reference to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, and that is that for all practical purposes the surveys already made cover substantially the cost of this canal; it may be that the actual cost will be two or three hundred thousand dollars more or less than the amount estimated, but there is a substantial estimate made for this purpose. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that these estimates always vary. I take as an illustration the State of the Senator from Connecticut. We put up a public building at Hartford in his State not long ago. We put in the law that it should cost only $400,000. We have already expended $825,000 on that building, and it is not completed yet. So we go on. These estimates are only intended as an approximation to the amount necessary for the improvement. The great question for us here to decide is whether this is an improvement of such a national character as to justify the representatives of the people in the use of the public money to make the improvement, and I hazard my reputation for good judgment and sense when I say that there is not an item in this bill that has the merit of this proposed canal, not even that item of $6,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River, which is intended of course to be a rival line to the line extending east of the Mississippi River to Chicago. So I submit that we have estimates enough to proceed with this work, and it is important that we should settle the question whether the United States is to undertake this work or whether it is not to undertake it. As has been stated by the Senator from Alabama, there are other incidental questions connected with this improvement that make it important to the people who desire to avail themselves of the benefits of this canal that they shall know what the public policy of the Government is to be, at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is just because that building in Hartford, intended or promised at $400,000, has cost $900,000, that I am very jealous of all these things. That was a public scandal and a vexation to our people. Those derricks stood there nearly ten years and Uncle Sam was paying 15 per cent. for supervision of the cutting of granite cut somewhere in Maine, I do not know where, until our people were sick of the sight of it. They gave the Government one of the prettiest and most valuable pieces of land in our city, and they started I think with $200,000, and it will cost $900,000 before it is done. Did the Senator mean to intimate that we were to take this canal in proportion?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I meant nothing in reference to that. I will illustrate in another way. Does the Senator expect that we can get an accurate estimate of this canal to dollars and cents before we commence the construction? That is an impossibility, I submit. I only desired to state that this canal may cost $300,000 or $400,000 or $500,000 more than the estimate, as the Hartford custom-house did, as the New York custom-house did, and as the Cincinnati custom-house did, and so on through all these estimates. We have estimates here for various purposes, and yet we appropriate year after year in addition to the estimates. Why? Because the public service requires that the expenditure shall be made, and we go on and make it. Therefore I submit to my friend from Connecticut that if this is such a work as requires and justifies the intervention of the General Government, whether it shall cost $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 is but a drop in the bucket to the millions of people who are benefited by it with reference to the products which they raise in the Northwestern States, which they must have a market for, and with reference to the products they receive from the great New England States, and from the Southern States, and from all the States along the border that they themselves cannot produce.

If it is not a national work I want it to go under the table. It is not worth anything if it is not worth four or five or six million dollars. Therefore I say that no further survey is necessary for the purpose of enabling us to form a judgment as to whether it is worth that to enter upon this as a national work, or whether we shall abandon it forever.

Mr. BUTLER. Why does the Senator provide for additional surveys in the amendment? If they are not necessary why provide for them?

Mr. ALLISON. I want this canal surveyed, of course, in absolute detail.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the Senator to say that the surveys are ample for all practical purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I say they are ample to begin this work.

Mr. HAWLEY. We are told in regard to public buildings now that it is not necessary to have any more such blunders. We have been assured by the distinguished chairman of that committee within two or three weeks that now we may calculate on contracts being made for the completion of public buildings within the sum signified; nor would it be impossible if this survey were really complete and thorough to make a contract for the completion of the work within the figures named; but I will not insist upon that precisely. This is the point I made before, and I will renew it in just about half a dozen lines: this amendment in this bill is not candid as it stands now; it is put before us as a part of a system, a fine large canal from Chicago clear through to Rock Island; and yet the one hundred and nineteen miles of that which are substantially completed now will allow boats of seven feet draught, and this canal is put down at six feet draught, and when I said before that must be seven feet, the Senator from Iowa nodded, and I say further that if we accept the one hundred and nineteen miles to be offered us by the State of Illinois from Chicago to La Salle, and thence to Hennepin, we shall then have the whole one hundred and eighty-six miles under our charge, and we shall be expected to make a fine ship-canal of it if it is worth anything. That is what is to be done with it. I would like the whole thing laid before us from Chicago to Rock Island, with a fair estimate of the fifteen to forty millions necessary to make a good ship-canal; and if it will do what gentlemen imagine, I am not sure but that it would be a good investment; but I warn the Senate, and I put it on record, that this is but a drop in the bucket in the cost of this great canal.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have heretofore voted against river and harbor bills as they have come up here and in the other branch. In doing so I have more than once stated that it was not because I was unwilling that the Treasury should contribute to the improvement of the harbors and of the great rivers of the country, for I was willing to the extent of the Treasury itself to appropriate every dollar that could be economically and under our system honestly expended to promote the navigation of great rivers and the improvement of the great harbors of the country. I would not stop at the amount, but it was because river and harbor bills came to me for a vote, in which a very different spirit predominated, it seemed to me, when they were filled up with appropriations that could in no sense be considered contributions to the great channels of commerce and the opening and deepening and improving of the great harbors through which that commerce was to come and go. I was compelled because these river and harbor bills were of that character to sacrifice, so far as my vote was concerned, those great and worthy objects because the bills were loaded down with such provisions.

But, sir, here is a bill which, notwithstanding it is filled with these objectionable features, carries along with it measures which do look to great and grand improvements of the water-courses and of the great harbors of the country, and I propose for one to let them carry the objectionable features of the bill, rather than to sacrifice them because of the objectionable features. I shall vote for this bill. I shall vote for it more because it has the six millions for the improvement of the Mississippi River in it and because it proposes to do this very work, than because it has in it appropriations for smaller rivers. I do not desire to criticise or particularize, but every one knows the features which in the aggregate count for more in this bill than these grand provisions which contemplate a permanent and lasting improvement to the commerce and carrying trade of the country. I accept this measure as the beginning of an undertaking that will make a grand ship-canal in the end, if the needs of commerce shall require it, from Chicago to the Mississippi River. I accept it as an undertaking to make a channel through from Chicago to the Mississippi River that shall meet the demands of commerce as from time to time those demands shall grow upon the country.

I admit, as the Senator from Connecticut says, that the estimates that the engineers report are not sufficient to justify the plan of the work, to justify the carrying out and undertaking of it as a whole; but I vote for this provision as a committal of the United States to a grand undertaking, which to say that they are not able to do is to belittle both the commerce and the appreciation of the commerce of this country. We are able to do it; we are able to make just such a water-course between those points as the commerce of the country shall demand; and it is our duty to do it, and not to expend in the aggregate more money fourfold than will be required for such a work as this upon streams that will when the money shall have been expended be left small and immaterial tributaries to the commerce of the country. Here is a grand thoroughfare; here is a grand water-course so easily to be made, so full of promise to the development and the growth of this country, contributing to all parts of it, that I shall be willing for one to carry a very large load of objectionable features and provisions in this bill, which I cannot rid it of, rather than lose the opportunity to do this much in the development of the commerce and the carrying trade of the country which its needs every year are requiring at our hands.

For this reason, sir, for the first time in many years I vote for the river and harbor bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, it is now five o'clock. I think there are others that desire to contribute something to this interesting debate, and it is apparent that a vote is not likely to be reached this evening. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries, announced that the President had on the 5th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 2034) to authorize the Secretary of War to deliver certain cannon for monumental purposes to the Grand Army of the Republic at Westminster, Massachusetts; also to the Danville Light Battery A, Illinois National Guard, at Danville, Illinois, for monumental purposes; and

An act (S. No. 2068) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the Jeff. C. Davis Post No. 16 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Vincennes, Indiana, six condemned cast-iron guns for monumental purposes.

The message also announced that the President had on the 6th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 188) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Monmouth.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. BLAIR, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. MORRILL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB. I submit the following amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation, to come in as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the increase of 25 per cent. on the import duty levied on all molasses, concentrated molasses, tank-bottoms, sirup of sugar, cane-juice, melada, and on sugars, according to the Dutch standard in color, imported from foreign countries, imposed by section 3 of the act of March 3, 1875, being chapter 127, statutes of 1875, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the duty on said articles hereafter imported into the United States from foreign countries be, and is hereby, restored to the rate prevailing before the passage of said last-mentioned act: Provided, That the classification established in the succeeding portion of said section shall not be affected hereby.

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GROVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1086) to indemnify the State of Arkansas for swamp and overflowed lands within said State sold by the United States since March 3, 1857, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at six o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 7, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. ROSS. I am recorded as having voted in favor of the passage of the Navy appropriation bill when I loudly and distinctly voted against it. I ask that the Journal be corrected in that regard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's vote will be recorded in the negative.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up and pass a bill for the relief of Mark Walker.

Mr. HISCOCK. I demand the regular order.

Mr. UPSON. I should like to pass a little bridge bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason I demand the regular order is this: general debate is ordered to be closed to-day at two o'clock on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and there are more applicants for that time than can be accommodated.

Mr. O'NEILL. It does not come with good grace from the gentleman from New York, who has had unanimous consent to pass an important public building bill, to now call for the orders of the day to prevent others obtaining unanimous consent. I hope the demand will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I still ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent, and hope the gentleman will yield, to enable me to call up for consideration at this time this bill to which I have referred.

Mr. HISCOCK. After the disposal of this bill, during the next week, there will be ample opportunity for all such requests.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am asking to get up a bill for the relief of a man which if not granted in a very few days will render him but long-deferred relief.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope to-day may be set apart, as provided by the rule, for the consideration of the Private Calendar. There are many cases upon the Calendar that should be considered, and therefore I ask that the House proceed under the rule to consider the regular order for this day.

Mr. HISCOCK. I must raise the question of consideration if it be in order. If we desire to adjourn and get away from here within any reasonable time it is important that the sundry civil bill should be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from New York that the question of consideration would not lie against the demand for the regular order of business fixed by the rule for this day, which is the Private Calendar.

Mr. O'NEILL. There is not a quorum of members present, and there may very well be fifteen or twenty minutes allowed this morning for the consideration of private bills to which there will be no objection. I think it unkind and ungracious in the gentleman to insist upon proceeding with the regular order to the exclusion of matters of this kind which can be disposed of in a moment or two. I permitted his bill to come up.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to dispense with the private business for to-day.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, and can be adopted by a two-third vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 9.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the consideration of the private business was dispensed with.

Mr. O'NEILL. I now ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 297, for the relief of Mark Walker, and put it upon its passage.

Several members demanded the regular order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SHOBER, their Acting Secretary, announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 1095) for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; also, that the Senate had appointed Messrs. ROLLINS, CAMERON of Wisconsin, and VEST as managers at said conference on the part of the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDING, POUGHKEEPSIE, NEW YORK.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendment to the bill (S. No. 1095) for the erection of a public building at Poughkeepsie, New York, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Mr. SMITH of New York, and Mr. SINGLETON of Illinois as the conferees on the part of the House.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK. I renew the motion that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN, (after a pause.) If no gentleman claims the floor the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill. The Chair will remark that if gentlemen of the committee who expected to be recognized should come in he will take it for granted that prior to two o'clock the reading of the bill may be interrupted in order that the general debate may proceed.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For the custom-house, court-house, and post-office at Memphis, Tennessee: For continuation of building, $75,000, and the law requiring that the marble used in this building shall be cut and dressed at the site of the building is hereby amended so as to permit the cutting and dressing of the said marble at any point within the limits of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. MOORE. I offer an amendment, which is acceptable to the Committee on Appropriations, and that is, at the end of line 101, to add the words "as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct."

Mr. ATKINS. What is that amendment, as I did not hear it read?

Mr. MOORE. I move to add in line 101 the words "as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct."

Mr. ATKINS. That is a matter of course anyhow.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a marine hospital at New Orleans, Louisiana, $100,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move the following amendment by direction of the Committee on Appropriations:

The Clerk read as follows:

For constructing a marine hospital at Baltimore, Maryland, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a marine hospital at Cairo, Illinois, $60,000. And the sums respectively appropriated for the three hospital buildings are in full in each case for the completion of the same, and their cost is hereby limited to the sums in each case herein provided.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move, by direction of the committee, in line 102, to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so it will read, "four hospital buildings."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to go back to line 135 for the purpose of moving an amendment from the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will submit his amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move, after line 135, to insert the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a site in the city of Dallas, Texas, and cause to be commenced the erection thereon of a suitable building for a court-house and post-office, $37,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am directed by the committee to move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the extension and repairs and extension of the custom-house and post-office at Buffalo, New York, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Treasury building at Washington, District of Columbia: For annual repairs to the Treasury building, $20,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of ground for the extension of the United States mint at Philadelphia, $400,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. In the first place I believe it is the substance of a bill pending before the House, and in the second place it requires legislation.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not see it is any more subject to the point of order than amendments which the gentleman himself has offered to this bill, and which have been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That was for a public building, the commencement of which was authorized by Congress.

Mr. O'NEILL. One was for building a marine hospital at Baltimore, Maryland.

Mr. COX, of New York. No point of order was made against it.

Mr. HISCOCK. No point of order lies against it. It was introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce and recommended by the Committee on Commerce to be built, reported back to the House, and by the House referred to the Committee on Appropriations to make an appropriation.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I can make a similar statement in reference to the bill for the purchase of ground to extend the United States mint at Philadelphia. That was a bill offered in this House. The bill passed the Senate for that purpose. It seems to me as much in order to this bill as the amendment to provide for the building of a marine hospital at Baltimore, Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order was raised against it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I did not wish to raise a point of order against it, for I am in favor of building a marine hospital there. At the same time I do not think the gentleman from New York can raise the point of order against this proposition of mine after a similar proposition was made by him for building a marine hospital at the city of Baltimore. I think in all fairness he should withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being raised against the amendment the gentleman from Pennsylvania must confine himself to the discussion of that point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. There may be legislation pending, as a bill certainly has passed the Senate, and by an unfair method of treatment some weeks ago that bill was not taken up, hence I have taken the body of the Senate bill and offered it as an amendment. It seeks to reach the same purpose of the Senate bill, and I think it is as much in order as many other things contained in this sundry civil appropriation bill. Why, sir, a sundry civil appropriation bill consists to a great extent of new legislation.

What is it for? What is the purpose and object of such a bill?

It is, so to speak, an omnibus bill, embracing a variety of legislation; and if an amendment to such a bill is a good amendment for one purpose and not subject to the point of order an amendment for a similar purpose is likewise a good amendment and not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that the Senate bill is pending now in the House?

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir. I want to be frank and fair in my statements. The Senate bill is now pending before the House. But I do not ask you to pass the Senate bill. I do not offer that bill as an amendment here. I offer a distinct proposition of three lines; and while it may be that the amount which I have placed in this amendment is the same as that embodied in the Senate bill, still, in order to make a new amendment, if it be necessary, I will increase or decrease the amount covered by the amendment and make it $401,000 or $450,000. In that case there is no such pending proposition before either branch of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The clause of the rule to which attention is drawn in connection with this point of order provides as follows:

No bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, the substance of another bill or resolution pending before the House.

Now, in the opinion of the Chair, the substance of the bill is the extension of the Philadelphia mint, irrespective of the proposed sum to be appropriated for its extension.

Mr. O'NEILL. I take it for granted, Mr. Chairman, that the important point to be considered in such connection is the amount to be appropriated; and if it would suit the chairman of the Committee of the Whole better, or if it shall meet the objections which might be urged against that clause of the rule which has been read, then I propose to make the amount $450,000, for the purchase of the ground contiguous to the mint, and for the extension of the building. That is entirely different legislation from that contained in the Senate bill, and removes any possible objection that may be proper against the proposition under the clause of the rule to which the Chair has just referred.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no doubt but that legislation affirmative is necessary to authorize this extension. Now, under the twenty-first rule, to which the Chair has called attention, the Committee on Appropriations have no right to report a bill, and no amendment to a bill is in order which makes an appropriation, unless it is in pursuance of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The language is a little broader than the gentleman quotes.

Mr. HISCOCK. An amendment would be in order if it reduced expenditures, but if it increased expenditures it would certainly not be in order under that rule.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to take up the time of this committee unnecessarily, but I would like to have read for the information of the committee, and to show the connection between that amendment and the one which I now offer, the amendment just adopted at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that it be read, so that the committee may see its precise terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the provision just incorporated into the bill for the construction of a public building at Dallas, Texas, was in pursuance of instructions.

Mr. COX, of New York. And no point of order was made against that provision.

Mr. HISCOCK. It was done in pursuance of law.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will yield that point with reference to this building at Dallas; but no such claim can be set up for the amendment just adopted in favor of the erection of a marine hospital at Baltimore. It was incumbent upon the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, under his own construction of the rules, and the rights that we have here as members of this Committee of the Whole, to have objected himself to such an amendment, or to have refused to offer it, for it is new legislation, and not warranted by law.

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a matter for the consideration of the Chair, when no member rose to object to it.

Mr. O'NEILL. Well, suppose a member does not wish to oppose it. Now, I did not desire to set myself up in opposition to the wishes of the Committee on Appropriations, and did not desire to raise the point of order against the amendment. I believe it unnecessary to antagonize the committee in such matters; but it is, I think, a matter of necessity to appropriate the money to extend this mint, and while believing that, I hope I will never rise in my place to object to a proposition simply because it may not be within the exact language of the rule when a strict construction is applied to it. I believe that the rules are intended for the wise conduct of the business of the House, and not to place obstructions upon appropriate and necessary legislation. But the point that I make, Mr. Chairman, is that there has not been any legislation, as far as I am aware, certainly there has been no statement of the fact that there has been authority of law for an appropriation for that hospital in Baltimore. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations offers an amendment to provide for its construction, and I, as a member of this Committee of the Whole, have the right to get up and offer an amendment of the same character; and I do not think in view of the fact which I have just stated that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations should raise the question of order and attempt to rule that amendment out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can make an appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am not, Mr. Chairman, in the habit of making appeals to that or any other gentleman on this floor. I have ceased making appeals to the members of this House. Members are disposed to get all they can for themselves, but as a general rule they are inclined to yield but little to others; and so far as my observations have gone, there is little use in making appeals to them. I stand here, sir, making no personal appeal, but I take the position that I have a right to take as a member of this House and a member of the Committee of the Whole and move the adoption of an amendment for the interests of the public service of this country and ask this committee to adopt it.

Mr. FLOWER. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Is this the same bill that was beaten the other day in the House?

Mr. O'NEILL. This is the same bill that was beaten by the selfishness of the New York members, the gentleman who puts that question to me and his colleagues, representing a locality where they never can get an appropriation for a public mint.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FLOWER. I thought the House beat it.

Mr. O'NEILL. It was beaten at the instigation of you and your colleagues, following the dictates of your own selfishness.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order. I say the gentleman, speaking to a point of order, has no right to attribute selfish motives to any member or any delegation.

Mr. O'NEILL. I had to say "selfishness," because I could not help it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has indulged the gentleman from Pennsylvania, knowing his representative interest, further perhaps in the latitude of debate than was legitimate——

Mr. COX, of New York. More latitude than longitude.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have latitude and longitude enough to take care of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, unless he has further remarks to make on the point of order, will now allow the Chair to decide the point.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think I have said sufficient to the Chair to lead him to rule as I desire him to rule. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania the Chair prefers to decide upon that clause of the rule which forbids the amending of a bill by annexing or incorporating the substance of another bill pending before the House. It is admitted that such a bill is pending, the substance of it being the object and amount that are involved in this amendment. Under these circumstances the Chair is obliged to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. FLOWER. That gives that a rest till another session.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

To enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to erect a suitable brick building, to be used for storing, packing, and shipping seed, $25,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before we enter on the clause appropriating for the Agricultural Department, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending paragraph relates to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rose before the Clerk began to read it, and desire to offer an amendment to come in just before that paragraph.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

After line 194 insert as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional grounds adjoining the United States court-house and post-office at Springfield, Illinois, $25,000, or so much therof as may be necessary: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may be satisfied that the purchase of such additional ground is necessary for the security of said building."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. My point of order is that for this amendment to be in order there should be a law authorizing the purchase of this land. There being no such law, it necessarily involves new legislation, which is not in order upon this bill unless it decreases expenditure.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say a word on the point of order. The Government has authorized the purchase of ground and the building of a court-house and post-office at Springfield, Illinois. That building is completed as originally designed. But the lot upon which the building is located is on a corner, and is surrounded by private property so nearly adjacent to it as greatly to endanger it in case of fire originating on the adjoining property; and when some parts are built up it will very much impair the utility of the building by reason of darkening the surroundings, and cutting off the circulation.

Now, this having been authorized already, and the ground being already held, I submit that the purchase of this additional ground is in the nature of repairs since they are required for the security of property owned by the Government. If the gentleman will allow me, on the merits of this proposition, I will have printed as a part of my remarks a report submitted to me by the officers of the United States court-house and post-office, and the judge of the court at Springfield, showing the great necessity for this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] on that clause of the third paragraph of Rule XXI, being the only one that suggests a doubt to his mind, which says no amendment shall be in order for any expenditure not previously authorized by law "unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." This amendment proposes something in the nature of a continuation of an appropriation for an existing public work. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from New York on that point.

Mr. HISCOCK. There was a law passed authorizing the erection of a public building at Springfield—will the gentleman from Illinois say when?

Mr. SPRINGER. It was within the last decade. The building has been completed.

Mr. HISCOCK. During the last decade a law was passed authorizing the erection of a public building at that place. When the building was erected the power of the Secretary of the Treasury under that law was exhausted. It was a completed work. The building was finished upon the land which was purchased. The work was completed. This amendment does not contemplate the continuation of that work; it contemplates the purchase of more real estate; it contemplates a change of that original work for which new legislation is required. As I understand it, this is not even a part of the site: the additional ground lies across the street.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not across the street.

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as that is concerned, I may be mistaken; but the work is completed; it is finished, and I insist, under any fair construction of this rule, it is not legitimate upon this bill to introduce legislation which looks to the change of completed work or to additions to that work when it has once been completed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a suggestion as to the rule the Chair has referred to, because I believe these rules should be construed very carefully in regard to appropriation bills in a conservative way, in the interest of the Treasury.

Now, the clause of the rule which the Chair has cited is right in point only that the case does not come up to it. "In continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress." That is, works not now done, but works going forward. This Springfield building is now completed, was completed years ago. If it be in order to move this amendment to purchase additional land, or to make any addition to the building, a like amendment would be in order for any public building in the country, no matter whether completed five years ago or twenty-five years ago.

It seems to me that, in the face of the statement that this building was completed some time ago, within the last decade, that no work is now going on there, no work at all is now in progress there, the Chair must see at a glance that the clause of the rule to which reference has been made does not apply to the case in point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be very glad to have further views of members of the committee on this point. The old rule, as the Chair understands it, has not been changed in this respect, and he has a distinct recollection that it was also intended to apply to an existing construction, an existing work, though such work may have been finished up to a certain point, supposed to be all that was needed at the time, as in the case of a fortification, or for the purchase of a certain number of guns for a fort, and many other instances where the work was completed up to a point supposed to meet the wants of the Government at the time the appropriations were stopped.

Congress continually makes appropriations for repairs of buildings, for adding a story to a building, for making changes in a building, for completing a work already constructed so as to meet the conditions requisite at the time the new appropriation is suggested. It is stated, as one of the reasons which the Chair should take into account in construing the rule, that the present building in this case is in danger of fire, and that this appropriation, in other words, is for the purpose of preserving an existing work. That is suggested as an argument for the admission of this amendment.

The Chair desires to administer the rule and to apply it in exact conformity to its original purpose, and would therefore be glad to hear a little further upon this point.

Mr. HASKELL. I have a word or two to say in connection with this matter. This bill is an appropriation bill, and amendments to such bills are uniformly ruled out of order if authority must be conferred by the bill upon an officer of the Government to go on and do the work. The amendments are always ruled out of order if there cannot be found somewhere an existing law authorizing an officer of the Government to expend the money.

Here is a proposition to make an appropriation, not at all for the purpose of repairing a building; not in the nature of an appropriation for the preservation of a building. Before this money can be expended the Government must acquire title to the land, the Government must obtain jurisdiction over the land. This amendment contemplates an appropriation of money which is to be expended for the purchase of property which to-day is the private property of individual citizens of the United States.

Now, there is no law in existence that allows the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain possession of that private property. There is now no law that authorizes the Government to obtain jurisdiction of the ground upon which this addition is to be built. Two distinct declarations of law must be made before this appropriation can be operative; one directing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire title to this land, and the other directing him to acquire for the United States Government jurisdiction over the land. This amendment contemplates enacting these two requirements of law before the appropriation can become operative.

If this was a piece of Government land, if the United States had now the title to it and jurisdiction over it, and it was contemplated to build a "lean-to" for the preservation of this building, it might possibly come within the rule. But here is contemplated an appropriation of money in this bill to enable the Government of the United States to go upon private land and acquire title to it and jurisdiction over it. Now, the rule says you cannot do that; that you must have a preceding act of Congress to authorize it to be done. There is no preceding act of Congress, and the proposed appropriation is one without warrant of law, and has no place on a general appropriation bill under Rule 21.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think the point of order is well taken, and for one simple reason. If the gentleman can offer an amendment as to one acre, or forty feet of ground around this building, he could with like reason offer an amendment as to a thousand feet around the building or a thousand acres of ground. There would be no limit to amendments of this kind if this is held to be germane, and no end to the expenditure of money without the existence of some law authorizing it. Look at the language of the rule:

> No appropriation shall be reported to any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works.

What does the word "such" mean? The rule says "such public works and objects as are already in progress." Not works that are already completed, that have been completed some time during the past decade. In my opinion if the Chair does not sustain this point of order, any amendment will be in order involving the expenditure of any amount of money and the purchase of any amount of property.

Mr. ROBESON. Undoubtedly the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is obnoxious to the general provision of the rule. The only question is whether it comes within the exception—whether it is the continuation of an appropriation for a public work now in progress. Can there be any pretense, after a work has been entered upon and finished, all land that was thought necessary for it purchased and acquired, the jurisdiction of the United States settled over that land, that it is the continuation of a public work still in progress to buy new land and commence the erection of new public works?

Waiving the whole question how much is mere repair to a public building, waiving the whole question how much is mere continuation of a public work in progress, if applied to the building itself, applied directly to property to which the Government already has title, this amendment requires not only an appropriation but new legislation—that is, authority to purchase and take title to land and acquire jurisdiction over it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I modify my amendment by striking out the word "security" and inserting the word "preservation;" so that the proviso to the amendment will read:

> Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may be satisfied that the purchase of such additional ground is necessary for the preservation of said building.

Now, if I may be allowed a moment I will explain——

Mr. HISCOCK. It seems to me we had better confine ourselves to the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am confining myself to the point of order. There is an appropriation already in this bill, beginning with line 178, "for repairs and preservation of public buildings." The Committee on Appropriations has put in this bill a clause for the preservation of public buildings; and I now offer a clause making a particular expenditure for that purpose.

If I could be allowed a moment to discuss this amendment on its merits, I could satisfy the committee as to its necessity.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the Chair that the modification of the amendment does not remove the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. SPRINGER. If gentlemen will give me their attention a moment I will explain the situation of this building. It is located on the corner of a block, and adjacent to the building on the south and east sides is an area of about thirty feet belonging to the Government; but outside that area, fronting on Sixth street, there is property belonging to private parties, and on the Monroe street side, within thirty feet of this Government building, is a large livery stable, the upper part of which is filled with most combustible material, such as hay. It is a wooden building; and if it should take fire this magnificent structure of the Government, which has been erected at a cost of $250,000, would be almost certainly destroyed. It is believed by officers of the Government that the building belonging to the United States is greatly imperiled by having this inflammable structure so near it—a structure which the insurance companies will not insure. This public building, containing all the records of the court as well as the post-office and internal-revenue office, is within thirty feet of this inflammable structure; and we should not hesitate about making a little appropriation of twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars in order to secure additional ground, that the Government property and the public records may not continue to be in so hazardous a situation. It is for the preservation of the property of the Government that the amendment is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the question of order. If this proposed appropriation applied to existing property of the Government, even in the way of enlargement, the Chair would have no trouble in holding the amendment in order as an appropriation for a public work in progress; for in the opinion of the Chair a public building is always in progress; and it is in order to provide for anything relating to existing work belonging to the Government for which appropriations have been made. But this proposition is for the purchase of real estate entirely outside existing property rights of the Government; and in view of the total separation of the property proposed to be acquired from the existing work, although it may be proposed after the acquisition to connect it with the existing rights and interests of the United States, the Chair rules the proposition out of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all parties owning, occupying, or operating bridges over any navigable river shall maintain, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, throughout the year, such lights on their bridges as may be required by the Light-House Board for the security of navigation; and all persons owning, occupying, or operating any bridge over any navigable river shall, in any event, maintain all lights on their bridge that may be necessary for the security of navigation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to move an amendment to this paragraph at line 383; and I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that the last clause of this paragraph only makes the provision ambiguous or uncertain.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana be kind enough to state his amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out after the word "navigation," in line 383, these words:

And all persons owning, occupying, or operating any bridge over any navigable river shall, in any event, maintain all lights on their bridge that may be necessary for the security of navigation.

I submit to the gentleman from New York that the paragraph without that is much better. It will then read:

That all parties owning, occupying, or operating bridges over any navigable river shall maintain, at their own expense, from sunset to sunrise, throughout the year, such lights on their bridges as may be required by the Light-House Board for the security of navigation.

That is specific and definite; but the other language creates an ambiguity, and I trust the gentleman from New York will consent to its being stricken out.

Mr. HISCOCK. The legislation of the provision which is in the bill was prepared by the Light-House Board and submitted to the Committee on Commerce, and at their request and the request of the Light-House Board, it was incorporated in the bill. The Light-House Board said it was necessary there should be that provision in the law for the purpose of enforcing its regulations. It was investigated by the Committee on Commerce and recommended by the committee and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is still not understood, and I believe if the Light-House Board had their attention called to that last clause of the paragraph it would be seen that to some extent it negatives the first proposition. I ask the gentleman from New York to agree to add the following words: "in addition thereto;" so it will read:

And in addition thereto all persons owning, occupying, or operating any bridge over any navigable river shall, in any event, maintain all lights on their bridge that may be necessary for the security of navigation.

That is necessary in order that the first proposition may not be negatived. The first proposition is undoubtedly correct. The Light-House Board should have absolute power over this subject. It should designate where lights should be placed, and the whole matter should be under the absolute control of that board. My object is to leave this matter unequivocally under the control of the Light-House Board.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment, that is, the last amendment which he suggests, and which I understand to be to add after "and," in line 383, the words "in addition thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to modify his amendment, and to move after the word "and," in line 383, to insert the words "in addition thereto."

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, I modify my amendment in that way.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is now recognized for general debate, in accordance with the order of the House.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I promise not to trespass on the time or good nature of the House for many minutes. I had not expected to take any part in this debate except possibly under the five-minute rule, and if the discussion had been confined to the provisions of this bill I am sure I should not have done so. I feel absolutely certain that all that need be said in defense of the several provisions of this bill is to explain them as they come up before the House for consideration. In the preparation of the bill every clause received full and careful consideration, and I think it is due to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. HISCOCK,] who was also chairman of the sub-committee which prepared this bill, to say that if, as suggested by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] there is in any one of its provisions a tendency toward extreme liberality, it cannot be charged to the chairman of the committee, but rather laid at the door of the gentleman from Kentucky and myself, who acted with the chairman in investigating the several subjects to which the bill relates. And I think my honorable colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] and myself, not unfrequently against the admonition of the chairman, drifted in the direction of liberal treatment of subjects in which we deemed the people generally have important interests to be subserved.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to say one word, and that is that the gentleman's statement as to the action taken by him and myself does not apply to certain features of this bill, and I do not want to accept it as the rule.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend might point out some exceptions, but I think they will be rare.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I insist that statement as it applies to me constitutes the exception and not the rule.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I shall be compelled to take my friend's ominous silence when considering the items of the bill for dissent, for he was amiable touching nearly all its provisions, and while not unjustly liberal, yet he was fair and just toward all branches of the public service.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My friend will not say there are not many provisions in this bill I opposed as strenuously as I could.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, yes; I think my colleague did sometimes fall into an error in that regard.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, that is all right.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I repeat that except under the five-minute rule I shall not refer to the various items in detail. The bill certainly has not been discussed in that view. It has received so far no discussion whatever from gentlemen upon the other side, except that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] did refer to it simply as a means of pointing his wit. He was witty over the appropriation to afford facilities for observing the transit of Venus. My friend was not happy in selecting that item as a legitimate subject for wit, although I concede that I smiled at his effort, not because he was witty, but because he was my friend and I liked to please him. He is a scholarly man and knows the importance of that observation too well to speak to an intelligent constituency in denunciation or in ridicule of it.

He next proceeded to speak of the triangulation of the country, which is indispensable in establishing base lines for accurate surveys, and to secure correct and accurate maps of the country. That gentleman may pronounce the word "triangulation" among his constituents with the idea that they will imagine it a new word and a term for playful wit, but the gentleman himself knows too well the importance of this triangulation and the necessity for the appropriation for the prosecution of the work, to say to an intelligent constituency that the appropriation is not wisely ordered.

He then proceeded, and it ought to have touched my colleague on the committee, Brother BLACKBURN, to assault our action in the matter of the appropriation for the Fish Commission. I submit to my friend WILLIS that if he had given a tithe of the attention to that subject which my colleague on the committee, General BLACKBURN, and myself gave to it, he would, I am sure, instead of attempting to ridicule or suggesting a decrease in that appropriation, have voted to increase it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say so.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly. I knew you would, because you have investigated the subject and know its importance. Mr. Chairman, if there is a provision in this bill thoroughly and wholly defensible, pre-eminently so over most others, it is this provision to which I am now referring. It is one that is in the interest of the whole people of this country; and I may here observe that it is perhaps not generally known how successful the efforts to supply the streams of the country with food-fishes have been. The gentleman himself might have shad upon his table to-day from the Ohio River; and while it is a fact that, under the processes of nature as shown by investigation, not more than perhaps 3 to 5 per cent. of the fish-spawn hatches or matures, under artificial processes adopted by the Fish Commissioner, strange as it may seem, 95 per cent. of the spawn is hatched, and your Fish Commissioner has within the last few months shipped to various parts of this country over a hundred million of young fishes to stock the various rivers and lakes of the country to supply food for our people. My friend Mr. HUBBELL calls my attention to the fact that it is possible, nay, entirely practicable, to supply our lakes with white-fish, and with a supply so ample for all food purposes that there need be no laws to prevent the catching of fish at any season when they are fit to be used for food. The Fish Commissioner has demonstrated his ability to do this; and, in fact, under the fostering care of the Government, it is being done.

The report of Professor Spencer F. Baird, that eminent and thoroughly practical scientist, will show fully and conclusively how important to our country the Fish Commission is. I trust, sir, that in the interest of the whole people we shall continue to give a cordial support to the efforts of the Commissioner having this important business in charge, with a view to supplying food-fishes in abundance in every section of the country. It is apparent that my friend in searching through the bill has not been happy in selecting subjects for the display of his wit, still I do not question his right to select subjects at random and according to his judgment. So far as the matters he named are concerned I am sure he was indulging in pleasantry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, so far as this bill is concerned its objects and purposes have been little considered in discussion by the members of this House, certainly by those upon the other side of the Chamber. But they have seized upon the occasion to arraign the Republican party as being opposed to reform in the civil service of the country, as opposed to everything that is calculated to build up and extend and maintain the public good. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] provided some considerable campaign literature in that behalf. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] was pleased to ignore the question before the committee and to discuss certain matters concerning the civil service of the country, and announce views which were in the main sound, and would receive the support and commendation certainly of a great majority of the members of this House. But that was not evidently the ultimate object of his speech, but it was to arraign the present Chief Magistrate of the nation for some grievance apparently of a personal character of which I have no knowledge. I shall refer to that further along, or possibly I may as well now.

I am not called upon here, Mr. Chairman, to stand up as the special champion and defender of the present Chief Magistrate of this country. I am not called upon to be his special champion in any behalf. I am called upon to say, as a member of this House, and I am satisfied that every member upon this floor will assent to the correctness of the utterance, that his administration up to this time needs no special champion from any quarter. It has been and is its own champion, its own vindication; it is its own defender. Mr. Chairman, my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, in the exuberance of his zeal to criticise the Administration, began first by alluding, and very properly, to the late President of the United States. Him he applauded, and in that applause we all most heartily and cordially join. There is no man on this floor but holds in grateful recollection the name and memory of the late Chief Magistrate of the Republic—General Garfield. His name and deeds will be always dear to the American people.

They furnish to us and our children an example of moral and political probity, of patriotism and unselfish devotion to the right. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot go before me in doing honor to the deceased President. He was my friend. I honored him and loved him living, and revere his memory now that he is dead, and shall teach my children to hold him and his doings in grateful recollection. But, sir, honor to the dead does not warrant injustice to the living. This country will bear me witness that not since the Republic had its birth did a President come into office under more adverse, trying, and perplexing circumstances, under conditions better calculated to try all that there was or could be in a man. Bending under the weight of a grave responsibility, standing by the tomb of one "the deep damnation of whose taking off" impressed every one, criticised and pursued, upon the one hand, with many praying that he might be unsuccessful, with others hoping he would attempt to achieve success by dubious means, he yet walked forward to the performance of the functions of his high office in a manner which ought to command and does command the admiration of right-thinking men everywhere, [applause;] neither swayed from that direct line by those who would have him incline to their particular opinions, nor yet moved by the unfriendly criticism of those who seemed to regard his as the unlineal hand that snatched the scepter from their grasp; unmoved by any of these influences, unawed by the hostile attitude of those whose support he had a right to expect, he has devoted himself unselfishly and patriotically to the honest, sincere, and conscientious discharge of the high duties devolving upon him.

I will hardly be accused of being of those who rush inconsiderately to the defense of any officer of this Government whose public conduct stands in need of criticism. I am not of any clique, clan, or faction which in bitterness or disappointment seeks to find anything in the administration of the Presidential office except a devotion to the public good. I am free to judge and criticise, however. I trust I am in a position to be just. Sir, the people will judge of the course of the Administration by the impress it leaves upon the country's history rather than by the degree in which it happens to interfere with the private or public ambitions of any man or set of men.

I want to say to my honored friend from Pennsylvania, to whose patriotism and earnestness and honesty in good work I desire to bear testimony, that in the exuberance of the zeal which led him caustically to criticise the Administration he has fallen into error. He first speaks of the deceased President as all that was good and law-abiding, as being the very soul of devotion to law; and so he was; and to all the good things the gentleman can say about the late President I can and do respond amen and amen.

The gentleman then turns to draw the contrast, and in his own language says the present occupant of the Presidential chair is the exact antipode of what President Garfield was and would have been in his administration. If this were true in the sense suggested by the gentleman, the present President should be impeached for malfeasance and misfeasance in his high office; if it savors of truth he deserves the public censure.

The gentleman proceeds to prove his allegations by referring to the matter of removals and appointments to office. I was curious to know how far the statements of my honored friend were justified by the record, and I have appealed to that record to ascertain whether or not the utterances of my distinguished friend were justified by the facts which he summoned to bear witness to the correctness of his statement. I have before me, Mr. Chairman, an exhibit which shows the removals and appointments to office in the United States during the administration of the great and good man whose loss we deplore, and also those made during the occupancy of the Presidential chair by the present Chief Magistrate.

One would have supposed from the statement of my honorable friend that as soon as the present Executive assumed the Presidential office, that in the plenitude of his power he had swept through the States as a besom of destruction, striking off official heads here and there and everywhere, and that he could be tracked by the decapitated official heads that lay scattered along his pathway. What are the facts? Let us submit the plain showing to a candid country and a candid world and learn whether some other motive may not move us in arraigning public men than simply a desire to serve the public good. Let us see if the newly developed love of civil-service reform may not have been sprouted in private grief, however just, or in disappointment, whether merited or not.

I hold in my hand a statement of the removals made by the late President and by the present occupant of the executive chair, and desire to call to it the attention of the House and of the country. I am here to justify the course of General Garfield, and to defend the course of the present Executive, at least until something shall be shown other than the mere assertions of a single individual or a score of individuals that in one case or the other the President was moved by other than a desire to promote the public good.

General Garfield occupied the Presidential chair something less than four months; not succeeding to a Democratic administration, but succeeding to an administration, however it may have been criticised by men who suffered from disappointment, as many did—whatever may be said of it, it was the purity of that administration, its freedom from taint, its freedom from corruption, that gave us this Republican House. It was its freedom from corruption, its freedom from taint in every department, that carried our candidate triumphantly into the Presidential chair in 1880. Succeeding to that administration General Garfield proceeded, in the exercise of that ripe wisdom and patriotism which we all know were characteristic of the man, to make the following changes in office. There were reappointments and removals. The complaint of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania is that the present Executive has indulged in widespread removals either to gratify his personal malice or to satisfy some longing and lurking ambition he is supposed to have. Let us see how plain a tale shall set that utterance down.

During the special session of the Senate, commencing March 4, 1881, and ending May 20, 1881, President Garfield made two hundred and sixty-six reappointments and fifty-one removals. Draw the distinction between reappointments made at the end of an official term and removals with or without what might be deemed sufficient cause, for I do not inquire into that—I take it for granted they were wisely, justly, and properly made—he made in less than three months two hundred and sixty-six reappointments and fifty-one removals. During the recess of the Senate he made thirty-five reappointments and thirty-eight removals; in all three hundred and one reappointments and eighty-nine removals. Of the changes in office made by President Garfield over 22 per cent. were removals from office. During the ten months of his administration President Arthur has made eight hundred and seventy-four appointments to office, of which the number of removals is forty-nine; or 5 per cent. of removals as against 22 per cent. of removals made by his worthy predecessor.

Now, one would infer from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] that the President had stalked through that grand old Commonwealth from east to west, gathering in official heads in wanton malice or playful pleasure as he went along. What is the fact about it? There are in the State of Pennsylvania of Presidential offices one hundred and eighty-six; of Federal offices, appointments, &c., 3,847. Now, of the one hundred and eighty-six Presidential appointments, how many changes—removals—do you suppose President Arthur has made? One hundred? No. Seventy-five? No. Fifty? No. Twenty? No. Ten? No. He has made five out of the one hundred and eighty-six, and two of the five were for violations of the statutes. Of the five mentioned, three were postmasters, two of them removed because they were defaulters. [Great applause.] Now, gentlemen, I call the deliberate attention and consideration of the House and of the country to this as a matter of simple justice to the living, and not as a rebuke to the honored and worthy dead.

I in no wise question that the late President acted conscientiously and patriotically and wisely in making the removals; and I as little call in question the honesty and patriotic wisdom of the present Executive in making the few removals he has felt it his duty to make; nor will the caviling or unfriendly criticism of ambition or disappointment induce me to reverse my judgment. But again. In the State of New York there are two hundred and seventy-six Presidential appointments. You will observe that New York has been cited before the country as presenting a mass of mangled official flesh and blood, a State in which the President has indulged in merciless and causeless removals from office. Now, what is the fact? Of the two hundred and seventy-six Presidential officers in the State of New York (there being 3,098 Federal appointments altogether) the President has made five changes, two of them removals for cause that nobody questioned or criticised. He has made three removals out of the two hundred and seventy-six Presidential appointments in the State of New York. What a shocking decimation of officials! [Laughter.]

In Ohio, of the one hundred and forty-five Presidential offices one removal has been made. Another exhibition of Executive trespass.

Now, sir, in the history of no administration from George Washington down to this hour has there ever been more considerate regard for the public service as disclosed by the public records. And yet the President is arraigned before this House and the country as if he only lived for the purpose of carrying out the designs and the schemes of a few malcontents.

Mr. BAYNE. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. With pleasure.

Mr. BAYNE. My friend says that never from the administration of George Washington down has there been so much consideration in the way of making appointments. Did a single President before the time of Andrew Jackson make a single removal from office unless it was for cause?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Unless for cause?

Mr. BAYNE. Unless for cause.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, no; but the question is, my friend will observe, as to what was deemed sufficient cause. If my friend had studied the history of civil-service reform in this country as carefully as he has studied to secure facts to enable him to assail this Administration he would have found that the moment Thomas Jefferson took his seat in the Presidential chair he began to ask where it would be convenient to lop off the Federal office-holder, and he took the ax for that purpose, and used it vigorously and effectively in the cause of Republicanism. Why? Because he acted upon the suggestion of George Washington, who said: "While I have the honor to occupy the Presidential chair I shall never appoint to any office of consequence any man who is not in sympathy with the plan and the purposes and the objects of my administration. [Great applause.] Such a course," said George Washington—he was really a patriot——

Mr. HAZELTON. He was a good one.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. "Such a course," said George Washington, "would have been greatly embarrassing if not in fact suicidal." I will publish his exact words in my remarks.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] allow me to interrupt him a moment right here?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. FISHER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio as well as of my colleague [Mr. BAYNE] to a sentence in the remarks of my colleague yesterday. In speaking of the Pendleton bill my colleague said:

> Promotion shall be made on the ground of qualification. The bill [Pendleton bill] fixes no term, and is therein essentially defective. The most vital element of such a law would be a fixed, stable tenure, which is the only protection, in connection with the proper construction of the Constitution, against Executive aggression.

On the 19th of June, three weeks ago, when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] brought in a bill from the Committee on Ways and Means to limit the tenure of office of collectors of internal revenue to four years, my colleague [Mr. BAYNE] made a speech here denouncing the very proposition which he upheld yesterday, using the following language:

> Until within a very short time it has never been a cause of complaint that officials who discharge their duties faithfully and well should have a limit put upon the tenure of their offices; and no such law has been demanded until within a comparatively recent period, and, as I must think and believe, for no other purpose in the world than to promote, not the good of the service, but purely political objects.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I——

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, yes; but this is "side-bar," and I prefer to proceed.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to make a very brief reply, not more than a minute or two.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Suppose you reply after I get through; I will yield then. I would only answer my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FISHER] by saying that so far as the language of his colleague [Mr. BAYNE] is concerned it had escaped my memory. It presents another case of deciding one way when it is your ox that is gored, and another way when the other fellow's ox is gored. It depends upon who is hurt.

I am also prepared to show in this connection the removals or changes which have been made from March 4, 1881, to this time, and will with the consent of the House insert the statement, with explanations, in my remarks, so that the country may be advised as to what has taken place:

This is all I desire to say in response to the remarks of my friend from Pennsylvania; supplementing what I have said by a publication of the list of removals in all States in this Union, showing how many removals and how many reappointments have been made. It further appears by the records that of eighty-five nominations made by the late President Garfield, President Arthur sent in every name but thirteen, thus following in the footsteps of his predecessor as nearly as possible, while allowing himself some independence of judgment, being responsible to the people for the proper administration of his office.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Is it not a fact that in over two-thirds of the States the present Administration has not made a single removal?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is, I think, the fact; at least it is the fact that in very many of the States not a single removal has been made. I think there has not been one in the gentleman's own State, not one in Wisconsin, and none in most of the other States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There has been one removal or change in Wisconsin—only one.

Mr. DE MOTTE. Will the gentleman state what number of removals there have been in the State of Indiana?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I can answer the gentleman by looking at the record which I have here. There has been no removal in the gentleman's State. Possibly there ought to have been some. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had not thought of speaking further on the subject of the sundry civil bill [laughter] until we reached its discussion under the five-minute rule. But my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIS,] who is par excellence a civil-service reformer, and represents a party thoroughly and utterly devoted after its own peculiar fashion to civil-service reform, [laughter,] was pleased here to arraign the committee of this House which is dedicated to that service, and myself individually, and to suggest by innuendo, by insinuation, that from such a committee the House could hardly hope to receive a bill which would tend to purify the public service; and he was actively and greatly concerned touching my own political morality at a certain time. He referred also to the fact that this House, in the Forty-sixth Congress, manifested and expressed the same lively concern as to whether I was elected to the Forty-sixth Congress by methods which a Democratic Congress could approve—by methods to which a Democratic conscience could reconcile itself. If that had been the only question I would have said boldly and defiantly, "I know of no methods, however diabolical, to which you have not on many occasions reconciled your conscience." [Laughter.] It was not a question of reconciling diabolical methods to a Democratic conscience, but a question of inquiry whether Democratic methods had been practiced by Republican candidates to secure a seat on this floor. They suspected that they had. They claimed, and with good reason, a patent-right on all the methods of stuffing ballot-boxes, cutting throats, and driving men from the polls with bludgeons, and they thought that possibly I had in my district infringed the patent. [Laughter.] I did not infringe the patent. The investigation disclosed the fact that I had prevented the utilization of their patent methods by my competitor's friends and supporters.

I am going to take this time and seize this opportunity to give a brief history, which your committee did not, of the election in the district which I represent and in the district represented by my honored colleague, [Mr. YOUNG.] It was known of all men in Northern Kentucky and in Southern Ohio that the first and second Ohio districts had been represented in this House for years by men elected by fraudulent votes; and few men to-day have the hardihood in my part of the country to deny it.

My friend from Kentucky swells with virtuous indignation at the name of Ephraim Holland. He refers to him as a gambler and a ballot-box stuffer. Well, if his party in my district does not know Mr. Holland entirely, inside and out, then he is unknown. Certainly he was prior to 1878 guilty of the delinquencies mentioned. He was the chief counselor, however, in all the quiet meetings of the Democracy in my district. His word was largely law to the Democratic party, and was known to be; they feared to thwart his wishes. In 1876 (and this is not denied by anybody) he was the representative of Samuel J. Tilden; he handled the Tilden fund in part; and all through election-day could be heard the tramp, tramp, tramp of the repeaters through the city of Cincinnati, marshaled and managed by that man. It was openly said that the Democratic majority returned from certain wards was not determined by the number of voters in such wards, but by the size of the ballot-box. [Laughter.] They filled it. In 1876, gentlemen, you all know—it is part of your country's history, spread upon the records of the courts—eight or more men who had stuffed ballot-boxes and repeated were convicted and sent to the penitentiary, a part of them upon their own confession of guilt. They explained fully and in detail how the frauds were committed. And afterward, as I sat in my place over there, I was confronted by one of the agents of that party looking down upon me from the gallery—a man sent here to hunt me down, or being here engaged in that work—one of the very men who had stuffed or helped to stuff the ballot-box, and helped to carry it up to the polls in the sixth ward, and helped to count the stuffed ballots in the election of 1876. I called attention to him during the investigation; he went away and did not take active part in the proceedings thereafter.

I knew of these things; everybody knew of them. The politics of the district had become a stench in the nostrils of the public, an insult to common honesty; elections a farce and a fraud. What was the result? When Ephraim Holland was convicted and sent to jail how nimbly did busy Democratic fingers hunt the shekels in their pockets to carpet the floor whereon he walked, to furnish him delicate viands to tickle his palate and sparkling wines to cheer him. Why? He was pregnant with information in regard to their practices and they were afraid he would give to the world that information. [Laughter.]

What next? It was my good or bad fortune, and the country's good or bad fortune, that I was nominated for Congress by the Republicans in 1878. I was confronted by the same machinery, the same fraudulent persons and appliances, and it was a question as to whether these nefarious practices could be again successfully utilized.

It was amusing to observe the gravity with which I was asked on the witness-stand whether I really deemed Ephraim Holland to be a proper instrument to prevent fraud! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And it was cheerful to hear me say I thought he was. In fact I knew it. [Renewed laughter.] I knew that he knew the iniquities that had been practiced and by whom practiced. He knew every man who engaged in it, every man who connived at it. But Mr. Holland was no longer serving the Democracy in the commission of fraud. What turned him from his Democratic idols? I will tell you. When the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered and he had suffered and done penance he was subsequently elected to the State Democratic convention, and there with righteous indignation his Democratic colleagues of that convention turned upon him and said, "To your tent, O Ephraim, we have neither lot nor part with you." [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Democratic convention?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Democratic convention—oh, yes! They spurned him out one door and then ran around to the other to apologize to him. [Laughter.] But Ephraim was indignant, justly indignant. Now, whatever may be said of Ephraim Holland, it is said he always kept his word. He was indignant; and when he came back he said boldly and openly, "Gentlemen, this thing shall not occur again. You will see where your Democratic majority will be without Ephraim Holland and Arthur Duffy as counselors and managers. We will see that no one holds back the box until all the other precincts are in and then make up the deficiency. There shall be no more ballot-box stuffing. We will see then how you will come out." [Laughter.] He stood off and did not listen to their prayers and entreaties to serve them as aforetime. What was the result? I will tell you.

It was suggested to me that this man could—and I had faith that he could if he would—prevent the fraudulent practices that had obtained in certain wards time out of mind.

His friends said to me, "He will do what he promises; that he would honorably fulfill any engagement he would make." I thereupon said to Mr. Holland, in the presence of honorable gentlemen: "Mr. Holland, do you think it is possible to have an honest election in your ward?" "Oh, yes," he said, "Mr. BUTTERWORTH, I think it is." "Do you think," I asked him, "you can secure it?" "Oh, yes," replied Mr. Holland, "I think I can." "Then will you undertake to do it—to prevent the practice which you and I know has obtained here." He said, "I will." He asked a pretty stiff price, as he said it would occasion him trouble and annoyance in doing it. I said, "No, I am impecunious." I then proposed to give him $150 for the service. He agreed to this. It was the best investment, as a matter of political grace and salvation, I ever made. [Laughter and applause.]

He did agree to do it. And he and Mr. Duffy kept the faith most religiously. He went to the polls, and what took place? He said, "Gentlemen, this old stuffing of ballot-boxes, this old trick by which you fasten tickets at the top of the box, must cease." He made it appear as clear as day how the trick he referred to was performed. It appeared that they had been accustomed to have a box so constructed that the lid would pull out in a groove part of the way, and on election morning pulling the lid part way back, so the bottom of the box could be seen, the judge, or one of them, would say, "You see there is nothing in the box." The box would be closed and the balloting proceed. True, the box would appear to be empty, while under the lid, in the top of the box, two or three hundred tickets would be fastened. The box being shut with a thud the tickets would fall down and there would be three hundred to start on. [Laughter.] What was the result of Holland's being on guard? On the morning of the election there stood those two men, Holland and Duffy, and when the box was produced Ephraim Holland said, "No, we will not have it."

A MEMBER. Will not have the patent covers.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, the patent covers, or any other contrivance here to swindle the people. They crowded about and said, "This is strange for you Mr. Holland." He said, "Strange or not, that is so." He then told them: "Turn up that box until I see it.

Pull out the lid." They pulled it out and they let him see it. They looked at him with utter surprise, but they knew he was in earnest.

Mr. ATHERTON. Did they find a ticket in the box?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They did not find a ticket.

Mr. ATHERTON. That showed the condition of the box.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That showed the condition of the box.

Mr. ATHERTON. And your $150 went for nothing.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Ah, yes; but the nimble fingers of your friends had not been on the box; the instrumentalities your friends were accustomed to use had been taken away and those who were accustomed to manipulate the box were made to understand that it would not be permitted. [Laughter and applause.] The political rottenness had been gotten rid of and decency and political honesty ruled for the nonce in that ward. [Laughter.]

What else? Why immediately there was a great howl from certain Democratic throats about Ben Butterworth employing Ephraim Holland! Ephraim Holland is a gambler, said his former Democratic associates. Gentlemen, when did you find that out? When did your righteous souls burst with indignation at the fact that he dealt faro? [Laughter.]

They said Ephraim Holland is a ballot-box stuffer! Ay, nobody knew it so well as yourselves. He had given you your majorities time after time, and you knew it; had with your approbation defeated the will of the majority of that district. But Ephraim Holland was denounced because he gambled. Indeed! There was not a word of denunciation against him because he stuffed ballot-boxes while he stuffed them to secure Democratic victories. He was denounced only because he kept his word and remained virtuous for twenty-four hours and during that time prevented the commission of frauds in the interest of my competitor by others, and was paid for his services. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I have never heard a single utterance from his old party friends condemning a single act of his that looked to stuffing ballot-boxes to secure Democratic victories. He was not denounced for gambling or perfidy, but he was assailed and bitterly denounced because he remained virtuous in the interest of political honesty and decency for twenty-four consecutive hours of that election day in October, 1878. That was the whole of it, and you praised him when he did ill, but the moment he abstains from evil-doing he is denounced mercilessly by those whom he had served. If my friend WILLIS can get any comfort out of that recital of history, then I hope he will take it and enjoy it.

But what else, Mr. Chairman. About midnight, after the polls closed, in another ward of the city, I had information that there was something wrong, that the supervisors were drunk before the ballots were counted. I got into a carriage as soon as the information reached me, and went in person to see about it. When I first attempted to enter I was denied admittance. But after I succeeded in getting in, a sickening sight presented itself. Some who are now for reform had been busy. Under the manipulation of a man honorable and honest before the world the supervisors had been plied with liquor, and one hauled away, dead drunk and utterly unconscious; upon a billiard table here, in a corner, lay another officer of election, puling, slobbering drunk, and here, in another room, lay another of them, drunk and helpless, and only one man of all charged as supervisors and deputies stood upright in the likeness of a man; only one man, representing honesty and fairness, was erect and on his feet, and that only because he would not drink the liquor which had been furnished to him.

What else? In another ward, at another time, they kept the returns and changed them at night. They altered them so as to suit their own purposes, and to increase their majorities, and you know, Brother DINGLEY, that at night blue ink and black ink look very much the same, and are difficult to distinguish apart. Now, they were too stupid to look and see whether they used black ink or blue—the original tally had been kept in black ink—and these honest Democratic officials made the changes in blue ink, and when daylight came their iniquity was discovered. The difference was plainly perceptible, and the alteration of the returns became palpable. And yet to this hour those men have not been even rebuked by their party friends. Confronting all this political rottenness and degradation, laboring as I did before high heaven to serve my country and overthrow these iniquitous practices, I was arraigned before this House and the country as if I had been a felon, my offense being that I had received a majority of the ballots honestly cast in my district, and had secured the services of that prominent and theretofore influential Democrat, Mr. Holland, to prevent a repetition of the frauds which had for years defeated the people's will. The lowest haunts of political degradation and infamy were dragged, and their vile and corrupting contents were wrenched forth and hurled at me.

Attempt was made to corrupt boys whom I had carried on my back through the snow at my father's farm, and to induce them to commit perjury; and it was said that I wanted through them to secure the commission of fraud and corruption at that election. Every source of infamy and corruption was drained to its dregs to furnish material which might be used to blacken my character before the House and the country, to oust me from my seat upon this floor. But no report came. This was not the fault of the House committee. My title was not tainted, nor the allegations against me proven.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to interrupt him to state why no report was made?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman will remember that the last investigation was conducted during the vacation at the short session of Congress, and during a considerable portion of that time one member of the committee was sick and absent from Washington. When he was sufficiently recovered, and had returned to Washington we proceeded to make a report, but the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who was then a member of the House, and of the committee, insisted that there would not be time to prepare a minority report, and out of deference to him, as gentlemen here will remember, no report was made. It is due, I think, to the committee that this statement should be made.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Very well; I will accept the statement of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, but I know him too well and have been his neighbor too long to believe or to accept patiently the suggestion that he would have reported to this House that I was guilty of the fraudulent and corrupt practices which it was attempted to prove upon me. No, sir; but more than that, when we asked to be permitted to show why the law providing supervisors and deputy marshals should be enforced, it was denied us, (and I do not say that gentlemen erred in their judgment, but at all events there was a line drawn in the investigation between the honest and pure election of 1878 and the practices which characterized and the frauds which attended the election of 1876,) so that we were not enabled to look back to the condition which suggested the propriety of the appointment of Government officers to supervise the election. I do not charge my friend with any unfairness, but I think before he got through he found that he had a most ungracious task to perform.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman from Ohio will remember that the resolution under which the committee acted expressly confined it to the election of 1878.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is very true, but it was also proper to have looked into the particular reasons which necessitated the enactments of the law providing for supervisors of elections and for that purpose the committee might have looked into the preceding elections. It was urged before the whole committee that with a view to determine whether the necessity for Federal supervisors existed and the propriety of their employment that the committee should investigate prior elections, and notably that of 1876. A majority of the committee considered themselves restricted to an investigation of the Congressional election of 1878. I will not say they were wrong in their construction of the resolution, but we would have been delighted to go into that investigation.

Now, one word more and I have done—touching the question of civil-service reform.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We are all in favor of civil-service reform. It is a question not of the end to be attained, but as to the means of attaining to that end. We have a great many theorists in this world, gentlemen who deal with ideal conditions, not existing conditions, men who would be eminently successful if God in His infinite wisdom had been pleased to make the world as they would have it. But it is as it is. The practical statesman, the practical politician, deals with the means he has, with the agents that exist, with existing conditions, and not with fanciful or unreal conditions.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will my friend allow me to ask him just one question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have only eight minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is a practical question and it is this. It has reference to the gentleman's own district. Does the gentleman when he applauds the practical operation of civil-service reform remember who it was that removed Amor Smith from the internal collection district in Cincinnati, a man who was said to be the best collector in the United States and so certified by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and I think against the protest of my friend?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The tender solicitude the average Democrat feels about a man with whom he has no concern is touching beyond measure. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I have a concern for civil-service reform——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No, no; I know all about that.

Mr. COX, of New York, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield further?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further. Recurring again to Cincinnati matters, I never yet heard any member of the Democratic party in Cincinnati criticise or denounce Mr. Holland's evil practices. It was only when he abandoned them that they denounced him; and you hear now how much certain gentlemen are troubled because I prevailed upon one of their political associates to walk in the path of honor and moral rectitude during that October day in 1878.

Now, is the Democratic party the proper agency to secure civil-service reform? I want to say to gentlemen and the country that men are not judged by a single utterance nor by a single act, but by the whole tenor and course of their lives. And parties are not judged by a single resolution or platform, nor by a single act. Political parties are rightly judged by their record and by the imprint they leave upon their country's history in the times in which they exist and move; by the manner in which they deal with the country's interests and honor.

Gentlemen, the history of your party is written. Its record is made up, and is as palpable to all the world as if printed in letters of light and suspended across the heavens between Orion and the Pleiades. Known of all men by that record, you must stand upon it. You came into the control of this House proposing civil-service reform, reform in all matters that challenged public criticism. How did you get here? I speak it before my country in deep humiliation; but it is the record of this Republic, that your majority rode to this House fetlock deep in human blood. Nay, nay, this is a matter of record and not mere declamation. To get your majority more men were murdered for attempting to vote the Republican ticket than fell in defense of our flag at Gettysburgh. In order to get and maintain your majority in this House more men went down under the knife, the revolver, and the shot-gun, than fell fighting for the Republic at Malvern Hill or Shiloh. And yet this party talks to us about civil-service reform; about political freedom!

There is not a spot upon the escutcheon of our country's honor upon which we do not find the traces of your party fingers. There is not a rent in your country's flag that your partisans did not shoot there with hostile lead. The time was within ten years when you did not furnish as much protection to American citizens in the enjoyment of their political rights within the shadow-fall of this Capitol as pagan Rome furnished to her citizens in her remotest provinces, and yet this party parades itself as the champion of civil rights and political equality before the law. Upon yonder wall hangs the map of your country. If I asked you to go and put your pencil upon a State where political riot goes unchecked, where political outrage and wrong go unrebuked and the perpetrators go unpunished, there is not a man in this House who would have the brazen effrontery to put a pencil within the boundaries of an acknowledged Republican State. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want a moment more.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. If the Chair will recognize me——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio as much time as he may want.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think I shall want only five minutes. Gentlemen will not accuse me of any unkind intention. I want to say to my brethren from the South (and do not forget it, gentlemen) that the mothers of the North that bound bandages around your wounded soldiers, who watched over them when sick and soothed and comforted them in their dying hours, who gave them tender care when dying and Christian burial when dead, are not the mothers who could or did teach their sons to hate you. We fought your cause, not you; and when that cause went down in the red sea of war we gladly welcomed peace and hailed you as our countrymen. All we ask now, in the language of the martyred dead, is, everything necessary for security, nothing for revenge.

To return once more to the map of my country. Go with me to any county where political corruption reigns supreme; go with me to the wards and precincts where the police on election day are doubled, where the police are trebled, where trembling patriots walk up to the polls fearful lest they be beaten over the heads with bludgeons or be thrust away by ruffians; point out that ward, point out that precinct, point out that county to me. There is not a man within the sound of my voice who will ever think of pointing to a county, ward, or precinct which is confessedly Republican. [Great applause.]

How is it, gentlemen, that political rights are only safe where you are not and threatened only where you are in undisputed majority? How is it? I have traveled from Maine to the Rio Grande, from the northwest corner of the Republic to Florida, at least in imagination, searching for an answer to this question. When my eye rests upon a State, county, or precinct where there is a clear Republican majority, I find quiet, order, equal rights, full and adequate protection to every voter.

But when I want to find the opposite of that—you know, gentlemen, it is a matter of record, these ballots [exhibiting the tissue ballots used in South Carolina] attest the truth of what I say—when I want to find the reverse of that, I say it in all humiliation, I have to go where Democracy reigns supreme and exercises almost undisputed power.

One word more and I have done. Much has been said about the preservation of the country's honor and integrity. In 1880 your party approached a victory away up in the frozen corner of this Republic, in Maine. What was the result? The credit of this country was chilled to the heart, the national securities sank in a moment. Yes, your country's credit was shaken, and millions upon millions were lost upon the bare suggestion that the National Government might pass under your control and its honor and integrity into your party's keeping. Nor is that all. What else? As it was flashed along the wires that span the country that you were successful in Maine, presaging a victory for you in October, there followed swiftly after messages to the great manufacturers of the country in these words: "Stop my order; if Hancock is elected I shall countermand it." In my own city an order had been given for twenty-one thousand dollars' worth of machinery. After the returns from Maine the order was stayed until the result of the October election determined that the country's integrity and its honor were secure against the danger of Democratic ascendency.

No, my countrymen, I say these things not in unkindness, but in humiliation. I but recite the record. It is the fault of the facts, and not of him who proclaims them.

Do you expect by legislative enactment to make men good? Oh, no; our fathers had no such hope. At the hearthstones we build the foundation of this Republic. Teach our children to adhere to the eternal principles of right, not because they are advocated by one man or another, but because they are right, and because apart from them there can be no salvation for this Republic; being as it is a Government of the people; a Government in which virtue and intelligence are indispensably necessary to the security of the rights and opportunities which belong to freemen under the Constitution.

Legal enactments are of little avail to control the action of voters who are so utterly corrupt as to make the highest and most sacred badge of citizenship a subject of barter and sale. The wretch who finds no trace of a higher and better law on the tablets of his heart will spit upon and despise that printed in your statute-book. The hope of the Republic is in the enlightenment and ennobling of our people. Teach men to aspire to the better things above rather than be satisfied in the contemplation of the fact that there are baser persons and meaner things below. To this service it is our duty to dedicate ourselves and our children. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ATHERTON. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. HISCOCK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is whether a question of privilege is in order in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. ATHERTON. Very well, I will submit the question. I understood a remark to fall from the lips of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] that is improper to go upon the record, and I move therefore to exclude from the RECORD that remark of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON.] The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WHITE,] and remarks in this connection that he has given for debate three hours to the right side of the House and only two hours and a little more to the other side.

Mr. ATHERTON. I think that when my colleague on the other side thinks upon the remark he will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized. The committee will be in order.

Mr. HUMPHREY. What was the remark?

Mr. ATHERTON. I do not propose to repeat it; but we all heard it.

Mr. COX, of New York. It was the remark of a blackguard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, the Chair regrets to say, is out of order in the remark he has just made.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chair should have stopped the gentleman from Ohio in his abuse of the privileges of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] abuse any person on this floor. If any such remark was made, it escaped the hearing of the Chair.

Mr. COX, of New York. I did not say that he abused any person; I said he abused the privileges of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is out of order. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. ATHERTON. It will be observed that my colleague does not withdraw the offensive remark.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. WHITE addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. By previous order of the House all general debate is now closed on this bill, the hour of two o'clock having arrived. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire simply to ask permission of the committee to print certain remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. On the pending bill?

Mr. HUBBELL. No, sir; but I desire to avail myself of the opportunity now to ask consent to print some remarks upon a bill to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Michigan.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Light-houses, beacons, and fog-signals:

For rebuilding tower and keeper's dwelling at Throgg's Neck, entrance to East River, New York, $10,000.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it to the desk.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out the last word. I do this, Mr. Chairman, simply to vindicate what I conceive to be not only my own self-respect, but I regard it as due to the dignity of this committee to take some notice of the peculiar attack which has been made upon me by the gentleman from Ohio, who has recently concluded his remarks. I designated the language which was applied to me by the gentleman on the other side of the House as the remark of a blackguard. I do not propose to withdraw that remark now, though perhaps it was made somewhat under the influence of the heat of the occasion which called it forth. But, Mr. Chairman, no one who heard that remark of the gentleman from Ohio, and no gentleman would apply it but would feel instinctively that it was the language not merely of the bar-room, for it would disgrace a bar-room, but of a worse, and in this presence a nameless place; and the man who would use that expression on any occasion, but particularly toward one who never offended him, and who had pleasant and proper relations on the committee with him, and who had associated with him on the floor of this House on terms of intimacy, (and this I may say, is not the first time that such language was used, for the gentleman took occasion in another debate to use a similar expression)—I say the man who would use that expression in this House, if he does not deserve expulsion from the House of Representatives, deserves its severest censure, and, at least, unless Ohio has degenerated in later years, he deserves to be kept severely at home, and denounced, as he doubtless will be, by his people. I did not speak, sir, in replying to my colleague, in any heat or passion when I addressed him and this committee. I served the State of Ohio in the early days of my political history, with men of character like Benjamin Stanton, Corwin, Bingham, Shellabarger, and others of that rank of statesmanship. I have gone through debates in this House for twenty-five years without having used an expression toward any man that could be construed as offending propriety and my own self-respect, and certainly without having this low, miserable language hurled at me. And I will not sit down here and take the jeers and applause of his party, which such language called forth, tamely, without expressing my indignation, when, in response to a question as to why an honorable man was dismissed from office in Ohio under a pretended civil-service reform, the gentleman not only assailed me but referred to my constituency in terms that were unfit, unkind, and untrue. I asked a reasonable and proper question in the line of his own argument, and yet that gentleman came back upon me with the lowest, vilest, most miserable epithets that belong to the most degraded vocabulary.

Mr. ATHERTON. And in the presence of women, too.

Mr. COX, of New York. And in the presence of ladies, and in the presence of this body and of that party which claims to be preeminently the party of great moral ideas, and which applauds him. The gentleman replies to me in his discussion as to the decency and propriety and need of civil-service reform by repeating the expression which he made use of the other day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but to say that I made an inquiry of him as to the character of this gentleman in Cincinnati, who was dismissed, in good faith. It was my business to ask the question; and when this assault was made upon my constituents I had the right to inquire whether that assault properly came from the man who upon his own oath confessed that he paid money—$150— for the purpose of buying up this miserable tool of both parties in Ohio, Eph. Holland.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HUTCHINS took the floor and yielded to Mr. COX, of New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take up any further time on a subject so thoroughly indecent and unpleasant to every gentleman of good taste in this House. If the gentleman from Ohio has any apology to make let it be made to the House, and let the language which he has seen proper to use be stricken from the records of this House.

I have not in all of my experience as a member of this body believed in filling up the RECORD with anything that is neither proper, pure, nor decent. I have a right to complain of the language the gentleman from Ohio has used to my constituents, and which he has taken occasion to use twice, as I have said, toward myself and this side of the House; and I claim that I had the right to use in response to such language such terms as an indignant feeling would naturally call from any man of principle or character who was thus assaulted. If the gentleman has anything to say in explanation of the terms I will yield the floor to him. [Mr. BUTTERWORTH rose.] I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a moment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman from New York is quite right in saying our relations have been of the most friendly character. If I had any criticism to make on my friend it would be that he has in this House—and I think I am not mistaken in saying it, and I say it in no unkindness—he has in this House assumed the right to be insolent without rebuke, and to criticise others without himself being correct. I know of no member of the House who more frequently trenches on the propriety of debate than the gentleman from New York, whether he does it intentionally and offensively or not. The House will bear witness between us, while I have been a member of this House if I ever trespassed once in the heat of debate he has done so tenfold oftener.

Now, I want to draw attention to the remark which drew from me the sentence to which the gentleman takes exception and see whether in the chaste and delicate mind he claims to have he finds comfort in turning this about. I wonder if he remembers using this language, suggesting to me that I had been engaged in the work of reducing a Democratic prostitute. Does that strike my friend as chaste and elegant?

Mr. COX, of New York. That was after the gentleman——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not yield just now. In reply to that I made use of the words I did. Nor did I intend the construction my honorable friend seems to attach to them. He seems to be worried.

Mr. COX, of New York. I cannot be worried about anything you say. The remark I made was after you stated that my constituents were all rotten.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman will bear me witness that before I made the remark he used the expression to which I have called attention, which was not only unseemly——

Mr. COX, of New York. That was in response to what the gentleman said. His first remark was that my constituents were all rotten. Then I made a remark to the gentleman in relation to his paying this man whom he claimed himself to be a prostitute.

Mr. MONEY. I rise to a question of order. If this is to continue I want the Chair to notify the ladies in the gallery to retire.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the two gentlemen can adjust this matter themselves without any intervention on the part of the committee. The Chair thinks they can do so as old friends.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not desire to say in the presence of the House or anywhere else that which would shock any ear or which would be offensive to my friend from New York or to any gentleman in this House. But the gentleman rose in my time and said that which was offensive and, as I understood, intended to be offensive; and in the heat of the moment I made a reply without deliberate reflection, and which I am willing to strike from the RECORD if that is desired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen can see to the correction of the RECORD under the right they have.

Mr. COX, of New York. Before I said anything that might be construed as either truculent or unpleasant, when I made the inquiry as to Smith, the gentleman designated my whole constituency in one word as rotten. I then gave him back some of his own language, namely, that this was a bad man, a prostitute, and that he had dealings with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Is the amendment withdrawn?

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I renew the pro forma amendment. I wish to say to my friend that I think he is in error as to the order in which our colloquy took place. My reply to him when he asked concerning the removal of Smith was not as he suggests; but I said it was remarkable to observe what a lively concern a Democratic member felt in the removal of a party in whom he had no interest, or something to that effect. The other part of the colloquy took place later on; and I did not design to be offensive. But my friend must remember he is something like a wasp; he has a good deal of sting about him; that he has a good deal of plainness and directness, and is not choice about his language, but delights in touching a man on the raw.

Mr. COX, of New York. But not in vulgarity.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not know how the gentleman would characterize his sentence from which I quoted.

Mr. COX, of New York. You will find that in the best classics. But what you said is not to be found in the classics, nor was it fit to be uttered anywhere in the presence of ladies.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not mean what the gentleman supposes.

Mr. ATHERTON. What did you mean by it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks all this is out of order in debate under the five-minute rule, but he has indulged it in the hope that the two gentlemen might come to an agreement.

Mr. COX, of New York. I cannot confer with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For establishing a fog-bell on the Hudson River at Danskammer Point, $5,000.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out the last word. When I spoke yesterday I had two objects in view. One was to impress, if possible, upon the House and upon all whom my words might reach the necessity of returning to the original construction of the Constitution for the purpose of saving the country from what I believed to be dangerous tendencies. As illustrative of that I showed the action of the present Administration, and I endeavored to show that removals from office were made during the continuance of the commission of the officers; and I undertook to show that every one of those removals was a violation of the Constitution and the laws of the country.

In the next place I drew a line of demarcation, which was political in its nature, between the course of the deceased President, General Garfield, and that of the present President, Mr. Arthur. By that line of demarcation I tried to make it plain that the one had regard for the entire Republican party, while the other had regard only for a faction of the party, and I here aver that that line has been as distinctly drawn as ever line was drawn between political parties in any country.

I averred that their administrations were different; and I went on to give the reasons why. The great difference between them was that General Garfield desired and proposed to represent the wishes of the people, and his official action responded to the demands of public sentiment. And I say now, and I ask any man to refute the proposition, that President Arthur, instead of responding to the demands of the people, is acceding to the demands of a faction in the Republican party which is in a great and a low minority.

There is the difference. It was illustrated in the Chicago convention, when the people triumphed over the minority and nominated a popular candidate. If Mr. Arthur were disposed to heed public opinion, he would carry out the principles laid down in the platform of the party in Chicago, and follow the line of conduct laid down by his illustrious predecessor.

But he has failed to do that, and I here aver that collectors and other officers have been removed by him, and almost every one of those removals has been against the earnest protest of the people. It has been done in New York; it has been done in Pennsylvania; it has no doubt been done elsewhere. When I showed the difference between the two men, one of whom believed it to be his high and solemn duty to represent public sentiment and the public wishes, and the other of whom believes or seems to believe it to be his duty to represent and carry out the will of a faction, I simply did what I had a perfect right to do and what it was my duty to do as a Representative and a Republican.

Mr. VALENTINE. If the facts assumed were true, you have that right; if not, you have not.

Mr. BAYNE. They are true.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the amendment?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out the last word, "dollars."

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] having aired his personal grievances, I will make no further reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to concurrent resolutions of the House, as follows:

A resolution directing the printing of 2,000 copies of the fifth report of the United States Entomological Commission, being a special report on insects affecting forest trees;

A resolution for printing 5,000 copies of a special report from the Department of Agriculture on insects affecting orange trees; and

A resolution for the printing of 1,000 copies of the special report entitled "Bibliography of Economic Entomology."

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, the following resolutions:

A resolution for printing 5,000 copies of the report of Professor Nourse on the Suez Canal;

A resolution for printing 2,500 copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for 1881;

A resolution for printing 5,000 copies of the report by Commodore Shufeldt, United States Navy, of his cruise around the world in the United States steamer Ticonderoga; and

A resolution for printing 5,000 copies of the report of Lieutenant Sullivan, United States Navy, on the problem of interoceanic communication by way of the American Isthmus.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 1516) for the relief of the heirs of Constantino Brumidi; and Joint resolution (S. No. 87) authorizing the printing of 2,500 additional copies of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk read the following:

For buiding a light-house on Sandy Point Shoal, Maryland, to take the place of the one on Sandy Point, and establish an efficient fog-signal, $25,000.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the establishment of two range-lights at the mouth of the Patuxent River, Maryland, $25,000.

For the erection of a light-house on the Great Shoals, at or near a point nearly opposite the place now marked by the "shark-fin" buoy, in Dorchester County, Maryland——

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is whether or not there is any law authorizing this appropriation of money? I believe there is no law now enacted under which this appropriation can be made.

Mr. McLANE. Upon the point of order I submit to the gentleman from Indiana that there has never been any special law authorizing light-houses. The provisions for the various light-houses go into the appropriation bill under the general light-house law.

Mr. ATKINS. And on recommendation of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McLANE. The practice of Congress for many years past has been to refer all petitions and memorials for the establishment of light-houses to the Committee on Commerce. That committee communicates with the Light-House Board, and makes to this House whatever recommendation it deems expedient. I will say that in the cases included in the amendment of my colleague the Committee on Commerce has reported favorably. Upon the report of the Committee on Commerce, the House refers the matter to the Committee on Appropriations, and without any law other than the law providing for a light-house establishment, the Committee on Appropriations reports according to its discretion. No previous law is required or ever has been required to authorize the insertion of an item for a light-house in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I concede that the more common and recent practice has been, upon the recommendation of the Light-House Board or of the Committee on Commerce, the latter generally acting upon the recommendation of the former, to refer these subjects to the Committee on Appropriations. But no custom which may have grown up within the last few years can change or modify the rule of the House. The establishment of a light-house is a subject of independent legislation—so much so that a large portion of our light-house establishment as it now exists, excepting, perhaps, some light-houses established within the last few years, has grown up under the provisions of specific law.

This amendment is a legislative enactment on an appropriation bill. It cannot be said that it is the continuation of a public work already in progress, because it is a separate and independent establishment. It does not stand upon the footing of an appropriation to continue a public work; for although it belongs to a general plan, it is of itself separate, independent, and specific.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Indiana refer to any bill which has been passed for the building of a light-house——

Mr. HOLMAN. No such bill has been passed recently; but I could call attention to quite a number of such bills in former years. I concede that recently no such bill has been reported to the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. No point of order can lie against this amendment; and I hope it will be disposed of on its merits. I desire to state for the information of the gentleman from Indiana that all these subjects were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with power to report them upon a general bill——

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to see that power; I know these subjects have been referred, but I deny the power.

Mr. HISCOCK. They were referred by order of the House to the committee with that power.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not with that power.

Mr. HISCOCK. This is simply a question of fact between the gentleman and myself. I examined the question myself, and found the fact to be as I state.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will show any rule of the House, any provision of law, or any order of the House, made by suspension of the rules or otherwise, authorizing these provisions to go upon this bill I will yield the point. But the mere fact that the subject-matter has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations does not authorize the incorporation of the matter in an appropriation bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman has not heard my statement that these propositions were referred to the committee with power, if they thought wise, to insert them in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where is that power?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have it not at hand; the gentleman must take my word for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. No such resolution so far as I am aware has passed in this Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman will have to take my word for that.

Mr. TALBOTT. If the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana should be sustained it would lie against every item in this part of the bill, because there is the same authority to adopt this amendment that there was on the part of the committee to insert all these items.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any rule or decision indicating that his construction is erroneous, the Chair will of course be glad to know it. But according to his recollection of the uniform practice, the light-house service as a whole has always been treated as a work in progress, and subject to appropriations in furtherance of the object. Unless some rule or decision to the contrary can be shown, the Chair will be obliged to hold that a proposition to construct a buoy for a light-house in furtherance of the existing light-house system may be entertained by the Committee of the Whole. The Chair is, however, quite willing to submit the question to the Committee of the Whole, reminding them that it is one liable to arise on every appropriation bill and upon a great many items.

Mr. PAGE. Since I have been a member of the House it has been the uniform practice to refer all propositions relating to the Life-Saving Service or to light-houses to the Committee on Commerce, and when reported back by that committee they have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, who have taken them up and reported such provisions as in their judgment seemed proper. In every case of a favorable report by our committee it has been made with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ATKINS. That has been the practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The action of a committee of the House can in no way affect the administration of the rules. But if bills or resolutions have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations with specific instructions from the House to make them a part of an appropriation bill, that of course forms sufficient authority.

Mr. ATKINS. As to what may be the technical ruling of the Chair or the technical language before the committee, that may be one thing. I was speaking of the practice, and the gentleman from California has correctly stated that where bills are introduced for light-houses and buoys and referred to the Committee on Commerce and reported back from that committee with a favorable recommendation, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, it has been the practice of the Committee on Appropriations thereupon to make the appropriations.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to state again, Mr. Chairman, so it may be understood, that the language of reference has been that the reference should be to the Committee on Appropriations in order that provision therefor should be inserted in one of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should like to see any rule of this House which provides for any such thing.

Mr. PAGE. There are no other bills reported from any other committee and referred to any other committee under like circumstances except bills relating to light-houses and buoys.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that does not change the rules of this House.

Mr. PAGE. The action of the House in referring these bills first to the Committee on Commerce and afterward to the Committee on Appropriations, with the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce, in my judgment, authorizes the reporting by the Committee on Appropriations of the provisions for light-houses and buoys in this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no rule providing for any such thing. The river and harbor appropriation bill is referred to the Committee on Appropriations entire.

Mr. PAGE. Not under our present rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. Over and over again it has been done.

Mr. PAGE. Not under these rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it has been done over and over again under similar rules. But that did not increase the power of the Committee on Appropriations under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state the point involved is one of great importance, but a very simple one. In the opinion of the Chair very numerous items reported by the Committee on Appropriations itself must be struck out on a point of order unless the rule suggested by the Chair is the correct one, namely, that if it is a continuing work for which the appropriation is made then it is in order. Every additional buoy cannot be considered to require a separate law or rule. It has not been the custom of the House to so regard such matters. The lighting of the coast is a continuous work, and in that view the Chair holds the amendment to be in order. Of course the House can reject or adopt it. That is in their discretion, but the Chair is obliged to hold this service is a continuing work and the placing of a buoy or the building of a light-house does not require a separate law to justify an appropriation for it. The Chair, therefore, entertains the amendment.

Mr. CHAPMAN's amendment was read.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, from the best information I could obtain I came to the conclusion that this amendment was not subject to the point of order, and consequently I offered it supposing no objection would be raised in that regard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the erection of this light-house has been submitted to the Light-House Board, and I ask the attention of the House to the language of that board in reference thereto. It is at the mouth of the Patuxent River, which is unquestionably the finest harbor on the Chesapeake Bay, furnishing a depth of water unknown almost anywhere on the Atlantic coast, furnishing a depth of water of forty feet within twenty feet of the shore, with a harbor completely land-locked, and the only harbor on a long stretch of coast on the Chesapeake Bay.

As I said, these matters were maturely considered by the Light-House Board, and here is the language used by that board:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, April 28, 1882.

SIR: Respectfully referring to Department letter of April 15, transmitting for the views of the Light-House Board thereon a memorial of citizens of Maryland for the establishment of lights at the mouth of the Patuxent River, Maryland, together with two other inclosures relating to the same subject, these papers having been referred to the Department by the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, I have the honor to state that this matter was considered by the board at its meeting on April 27, when the conclusion was reached that the interests of commerce and navigation require that two range-lights be established to guide into the Patuxent River, which affords a valuable harbor of refuge for vessels passing up and down the Chesapeake Bay.

The estimated cost of establishing these range-lights is $25,000.

The papers in the case referred to the board are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE DEWEY,
Commander, U. S. N.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, there are now in process of construction two railroads terminating on each side of this harbor. To this harbor, which in many countries would be esteemed of incalculable value, two roads are being constructed to-day; and the Committee on Commerce, considering the recommendation of this Light-House Board, unhesitatingly recommend the appropriation be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has any estimate been made for it?

Mr. CHAPMAN. Yes, sir; $25,000 was the amount recommended by the Light-House Board:

The estimated cost of establishing these range-lights is $25,000.

That is the language of the Light-House Board. Now, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the latter part of the amendment, I will say that this has been done at the instance of a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Maryland. When questions of this kind are submitted to the Light-House Board they act upon them; and this is the conclusion at which they arrived in that case:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, April 28, 1882.

SIR: Referring to Department letter of March 23, inclosing a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Maryland, asking the establishment of a light-house on Great Shoals, Tangier Sound, Chesapeake Bay, in Dorchester County, Maryland, for the views of the board, I have the honor to return the resolution in question, and to state that the board, at its session held yesterday, examined all the facts bearing on the subject that it had been able to obtain, and reached the conclusion that a sixth-order light, which it is estimated can be erected for $15,000, would be of advantage to the commerce of this neighborhood.

Very respectfully,

GEO. DEWEY,
Commander, U. S. N.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Now, one other remark as to the first part of the amendment offered to ask two range-lights at the mouth of the Patuxent River. I wish to say a single word and call attention to a statement made to me by an old sea captain who had spent his life in the service. When he called my attention to the fact of the necessity for such a provision as this, he said that occasions had arisen during his experience when he would have given ten years of his life to have gotten into that river with his vessel at night when there were storms upon the bay; but there being no lights there, this splendid harbor, only sixty miles from this capital, was entirely useless, and he was unable to get into it, and had to take his chances in the storms prevailing in the bay.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the recommendation of the Light-House Board will be concurred in, and that this amendment will be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. After a careful consideration of the amount which we thought Congress could afford to appropriate for light-houses, taking into consideration the amount that should be appropriated for all purposes in that connection, and after the fullest consultation with the Light-House Board in reference to the necessities of this branch of the service, as also in connection with the necessities of other branches of the service, the committee came to the conclusion that the matter should remain in abeyance for the present, and that the needs of navigation did not require this appropriation at this time. We have appropriated for a great many light-houses, and made liberal provision in that respect. We have not undertaken in this bill to appropriate the full amount of the estimates that have been made by the Department and have not undertaken to give the full amount that they have recommended. But we have given all that we deemed necessary or appropriate at this time. Therefore I oppose the amendment and hope it will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 45.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To construct a light-house on Ram Island, Booth Bay Harbor, on the coast of Maine, $25,000.

Mr. BRENTS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 443:

"To commence the establishment of a light-house on Point Hanson, at the south side of the entrance to Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory, $7,500."

Mr. HISCOCK. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago I introduced a bill, on the recommendation of the Light-House Board and which met the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, to erect a light-house at this point costing $15,000. That bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce of this House, and they have made a favorable report upon it, which, however, has not yet been received from the Printer. That bill was based upon a letter from the Light-House Board, which I desire to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to say that a bill is now pending before the House for this same purpose?

Mr. BRENTS. The bill to which I referred has been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce and referred to the Committee on Appropriations; but, as I have said, the report has not yet been printed, and under the ruling of the Chair a short time ago it is not subject to the point of order on that account. The Committee on Commerce recommend that it be put into the appropriation bill, but it was too recently done to receive consideration before that committee, and the report, as I have stated, has not yet been received from the Printer.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not care to oppose this amendment upon the point of order, but prefer to oppose it upon the merits, and what I have already said in reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland applies equally to this case. We have given already one light-house to that Territory, one to Oregon, and two others upon the Pacific coast, and have distributed the money where in our judgment the needs of commerce most demanded it. I do not believe that the bill should be increased by this item and this further appropriation made. I hope it will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York interrupted the gentleman from Washington Territory, who had requested to have a certain letter from the Light-House Board read.

Mr. BRENTS. I ask to have the letter which I send to the desk read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, June 20, 1882.

The board has the honor to acknowledge Department letter of June 19, inclosing another from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, dated June 16, inclosing bill H. R. 6373, for establishing a light-house at the entrance to Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory, and bill H. R. 6374, for establishing a light-house and fog-signal on Destruction Island, Washington Territory, asking on them the views of the Light-House Board.

In reply, I beg leave to say, as was previously said in letter of May 10, that the board recommends that a light be established on Point Hanson, at the south side of the entrance to Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory, at an estimated cost of $15,000, and that a first-order light and fog-signal be established on Destruction Island, Washington Territory, at an estimated cost of $85,000.

The letter and bills are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

F. U. FARQUHAR,
Major of Engineers, U. S. A., Engineer Secretary.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. BRENTS. It will be observed that two light-houses are recommended by that letter, one to cost $85,000 and the other to cost $15,000. I am not asking now for the construction or for an appropriation to construct the one to cost $85,000. But for this one, which is estimated to cost $15,000, I am asking simply one-half of that amount to begin the work.

It is, Mr. Chairman, a very necessary appropriation. The shipments of lumber that go out from that port pass to Europe, to Australia, to New York, and to all parts of the world. Two ships were lost at this point during the last fall. It is of the greatest necessity for the commerce of that portion of the country that a light-house should be constructed there, and as it costs but a nominal amount, I hope no objection will be made. I trust the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Washington Territory.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 32.

Mr. BRENTS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only ten members voting therefor.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

That it shall be the duty of the Light-House Board to apply the money herein appropriated, as far as can be without detriment to the interests of the Government, by contract. When work cannot be done or materials purchased by contract without injury to the public interests, it may be prosecuted by hired labor, and materials purchased in open market.

Mr. HISCOCK. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 456, add the following:

"That section 4429 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:"

"'Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may grant permission to use any boiler or steam generator not constructed of riveted iron or steel plates upon the certificate of the supervising inspector of steamboats for the district wherein such boiler or generator is to be used, and other satisfactory proof that the use of the same is safe and efficient; said permit to be valid until the next regular meeting of the supervising inspectors shall act thereon.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Coast and Geodetic Survey:

For survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, eastern division: For every purpose and object necessary for and incident to the continuation of the survey of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States; of the survey of the Mississippi River and other rivers to the head of tide-water or ship navigation; of deep-sea soundings, temperature, and current observations off and along the above-named coasts, in the Gulf of Mexico, and throughout the Gulf Stream; for resurveys of such portions of the above-named coasts as may be necessary, including the resurvey of Long Island Sound and the completion of the resurvey of Delaware Bay and River; for the preparation and publication of charts, of the Coast Pilot, of a magnetic map of Eastern North America, and of a general map of the eastern part of the United States, and for the compensation of the superintendent, assistants, aids, clerks, computers, draughtsmen, engravers, electrotypists, instrument-makers, copper-plate printers, tidal observers, watchmen, messengers, laborers, and all other employés necessary to carry on the work in the office and in the field in conformity with the regulations adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the purchase of materials necessary therefor, $310,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to offer an amendment changing the amount from $310,000 to $264,000. The reason for this change is that the two following items, $16,000 for furnishing points for State surveys and $30,000 for transcontinental geodetic work, were included in the estimates for which the appropriation was made in the paragraph that has just been read. We subdivided the work, making appropriations for these two branches of the work by themselves; and by a mistake in the footing, the gross total has not been reduced.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. This paragraph in lines 471 and 472 authorizes the preparation and publication of a general map of the eastern part of the United States. I desire to ask whether that portion of this paragraph is in order; whether it is not the commencement of a new work? I am aware that heretofore there has been provision for a coast and geodetic map showing whatever properly pertains to the survey; but I believe this is the first provision authorizing the preparation and publication of a general map of a given portion of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is aware, as well as the Chair, that for years a part of the work of that bureau has been the issue of charts and maps of the coast. The Chair is obliged, from a glance at this, to assume that it is in continuation of the same work, only extending the scope and range covered by it. That would be the ruling of the Chair unless something to the contrary appears.

Mr. HOLMAN. The proper business of a geodetic survey is the work of actual survey and the establishment of geodetic points within the general scheme of the survey. A general outline of the survey would seem to be within the scope of the appropriations made from year to year. But does not this contemplate something beyond that—not simply the establishment of geodetic points and marking them on charts, as in the Coast Survey, but something beyond that—the publication of a map?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is hardly able to assume that, the language of the clause showing it to be in the line of the general work. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the heading "Coast and Geodetic Survey:"

For transportation of instruments, maps, and charts; the purchase of new instruments, books, maps, and charts; gas and other miscellaneous expenses, $13,400.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the paragraph, for the purpose of calling attention to the extraordinary amount of these appropriations. The amount, if I have added the items correctly, is $594,500; I mean the whole amount appropriated for the Coast and Geodetic Survey. I believe that is much the largest appropriation that has been made. While I concede that a coast and geodetic survey is very proper work and justifies liberal appropriations, because it provides facilities for our commerce and is a matter that cannot be overlooked, and while I think, therefore, the appropriations that have been made heretofore of $350,000 for the Coast Survey are entirely proper, and while, perhaps, to some extent in connection with the Coast Survey the work of the Geodetic Survey is proper enough, yet the swelling this work up to the extent of over half a million dollars it seems to me is going beyond the necessities of the country at this time. The portion of the work which applies to the Geodetic Survey is a work that may progress slowly. There is no necessity for any great haste to determine the geodetic points in various sections of the United States. That is a matter more of scientific interest than of practical concern.

It seems to me, therefore, this item goes beyond what the public service actually requires. I do not, however, press my amendment to strike out the paragraph last read, as the striking out of that paragraph alone would be a matter of no moment. But I think the appropriation made here is scarcely authorized by the present condition of affairs, and the necessities of the country; and I think also the largest portion of the appropriation should be expended on the Coast Survey.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the heading "Coast and Geodetic Survey:"

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to organize the force for which this appropriation is to be expended, and fix the salaries and compensation to be paid to the members thereof, and to make his estimate for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1883, in detail, in reference to the force to be employed, with its grades and compensation to the respective grades, and specifying the branches of work in which it should be employed, and the amount to be expended upon each branch.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"The provisions of section 3648 of Revised Statutes authorizing advances of public funds to be made in certain cases to persons in the military and naval service are hereby made likewise applicable to persons employed in the Coast and Geodetic Survey."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. HISCOCK. The amendment certainly is a change of existing law, and I am unable to see wherein it reduces expenditure. I know it is very strongly pressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He submitted to me the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject; but it hardly came up to the requirements of the Committee on Appropriations as to what should be a recommendation from that Department.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not think it is liable to the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. What is the use of it?

Mr. BAYNE. It simply enables the disbursing officer of the Coast and Geodetic Survey to do lawfully what he is compelled to do by the exigencies of that service. For instance, if a party is detailed to go out on an expedition and requires to purchase material at Chicago or Omaha or some other point, this disbursing officer is compelled to advance the money in order to enable the party to purchase the material at the place nearest the point where the operations are to begin.

Section 3648 of the Revised Statutes, the provisions of which it is proposed by this amendment to extend to this service, provides abundant protection in all cases. It enables the President to prescribe such rules and regulations as will protect the Government and enable the work to be carried on without the disbursing officer apparently coming in conflict with the law. If the law will afford him that protection which he ought to have, and which every disbursing officer ought to have where the exigencies of the service require him to act in this way, I do not see why it should not be extended to him.

Some day or other, if a default shall occur on any occasion, if one of these advances which are necessary shall happen to be lost or in any way be made unavailable, a bill will have to be introduced into Congress for the relief of the disbursing officer; and the justification of that officer will be put on the ground that it was absolutely necessary for him to advance the money, or otherwise the Government would incur great additional expense.

This amendment in a way will retrench expenditures, because if the disbursing officer of the Coast and Geodetic Survey should live strictly up to the law he would refuse to make any advance, and in that way the party would be required to make purchases at a point distant from where it is to start, or to delay until the money could be sent; and the cost of transportation and the delay would be two elements which would go to make an increase of expenditures which would be obviated by this amendment.

I wish the Committee on Appropriations would accept it, because it is simply dealing by this disbursing officer as all other disbursing officers of the Government are dealt by. It is recommended by Professor Hilgard, the chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, though the Secretary of the Treasury says he is not sufficiently acquainted with the exigencies of the service to state whether this proposed action is absolutely required or not.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not desire to be heard further on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is liable to the point of order, and therefore rules it out.

Mr. STEELE. I move to insert as an additional paragraph that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to credit Thad Butler, lately in the employment of the Interior Department, with the sum of $215, the same being stopped against him because it was expended in payment of salary from the contingent fund, this being the only fund or money furnished or available in the Interior Department for the purpose above named.

Mr. STEELE. In explanation of that amendment I will state that Mr. Butler was employed under the direction of the Interior Department. The sum of $550 was sent to him to pay expenses, including his own salary. That money was taken from the contingent fund of the Department, and the Secretary of the Interior said that it was right; but the Secretary of the Treasury said it was taken from the wrong fund.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs refused to take the money I tendered him for Mr. Butler and to give him other money, because he said he did not have any other fund from which to make the payment. Consequently it is necessary to have legislation of this kind in order to relieve Mr. Butler.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 5004) to accept and ratify an agreement with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians for the sale of a portion of their reservation in Idaho Territory required for the use of the Utah and Northern Railroad, and to make the necessary appropriation for carrying out the same;

An act (H. R. No. 6004) making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Mound City Illinois, to the national military cemetery, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 6225) to authorize the changing of alley-ways in the city of Washington;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) authorizing the Secretary of War to supply artillery and camp equipage to the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Bismarck Grove, in Douglas County, Kansas;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) accepting the offer of Dr. H. D. Cogswell, of San Francisco, California, to donate to the Government of the United States an ornamental drinking-fountain, to be erected at his cost in the city of Washington;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for fees of witnesses in the United States courts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 247) to provide for the printing of public documents for binding and distribution to those entitled to receive them; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 249) amending a paragraph in the "act for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department," approved May 1, 1882, to correct an error in the enrollment thereof.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, lights, and water for public buildings: For fuel, lights, water, and miscellaneous items required by the janitors and firemen in the proper care of the buildings, furniture, and heating apparatus, exclusive of personal services, for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $400,000.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for the compensation of a supervisor of elevators and other steam machinery of the Executive Departments at Washington, District of Columbia, $1,500; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a suitable person as supervisor, whose duty shall be to make examinations and tests of the gas apparatus, elevators, and steam machinery, for the information of the various Departments, keeping a record of the same for reference.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make a point of order upon this amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. Before the point of order is made, will my colleague hear me?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly; let the point of order be reserved.

Mr. COX, of New York. I offer this amendment simply with the view of providing means of safety for human lives which have been imperiled by reason of our having no competent engineers in connection with our steam machinery, elevators, &c. There have been two explosions in the Navy Department, connected with the elevator. It appears that mere firemen are often employed to act as engineers. In many cases men of no experience are in charge of machinery of this kind. My attention has been called to the matter again and again, and I could give the facts to the committee if I had here the statements I have received. It seems to me it is important to provide that competent persons shall have charge of the elevators, gas apparatus, and various machinery connected with the Departments, so as to prevent peril to human life from the incompetency of persons employed. I hope my colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] will not make a point of order upon this salutary amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. I must. This is a new matter; the committee has not investigated it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment appears to create a new office, not provided for by law.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know that the amendment is obnoxious to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is ruled out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture and repairs of furniture for public buildings: For furniture and repairs of furniture, and carpets, for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department; and for furniture for nine new buildings, namely: at Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania; New York, New York (barge-office;) Albany, New York; Charleston, West Virginia; Danville, Virginia; Montgomery, Alabama; Paducah, Kentucky; Topeka, Kansas; Saint Louis, Missouri; and at Cleveland, Ohio, $200,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by reducing the amount of this appropriation to $150,000. It seems to me the appropriation proposed for the furnishing of these buildings is unnecessarily large. It appears that there are nine new buildings, and with the appropriation proposed in the bill there will be $22,222 for each of them. I think there is no reason why this extravagance in the furnishing of public offices should be indulged in. A gentleman by my side says that they are "regal." I admit that these buildings are regal in their proportions and in the general extravagance of their make-up. But in furnishing them, I think some approximation to the simplicity and plainness consistent with our form of government might properly be maintained. An appropriation of $150,000 for furnishing these buildings would appear to be exceedingly ample. I see no reason why the public offices of the United States should be furnished in a style so much out of harmony with the public offices in the various counties and States. I hope that the Committee of the Whole will adopt the amendment; for $150,000 is certainly a very liberal appropriation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I believe the estimates for this service are $310,000. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars was appropriated last year. The committee had no doubt that in the last Congress the Committee on Appropriations practiced the strictest economy in respect to this appropriation and we acted somewhat upon the basis adopted by that committee. The increase which we have made upon the amount appropriated last year seems to be required by reason of the additional new buildings provided for. We have no doubt that in this appropriation we are holding the Department within very narrow limits.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 14, noes 36.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am entirely satisfied if we can have have a vote in the House on this proposition.

Mr. HISCOCK. I cannot consent to that.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 96.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF BIGAMY.

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882, as follows:

For salaries of commissioners, at $3,000 each, $15,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise a point of order upon the paragraph just read. The point of order which I am about to make would also apply properly to the next three paragraphs; but I cannot let the present paragraph pass without presenting the point. It is that there is no law authorizing and providing for this expenditure of money; that it is new and independent legislation; that the law already passed for the suppression of polygamy contemplates the payment of the salaries of these commissioners, not out of the public Treasury, but out of the treasury of Utah.

When the point of order was made the response of the Chair was, if my memory is correct, that the bill was not subject to the point of order because it did not involve an appropriation; and inasmuch as the expenditure contemplated was to be paid out of the treasury of Utah and not out of the Treasury of the United States, this proposition, if that ruling be correct, (and it must be presumed to be correct, as it was the decision of the Chair and was acquiesced in,) then it follows, I say, if that proposition be correct, that there is no law authorizing this appropriation of money.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman apply the point of order to this paragraph?

Mr. HOLMAN. It would apply to the pending paragraph in line 652 and 653 as well as to the two paragraphs which follow it. I am willing that the point of order shall be considered as applying to the whole three paragraphs.

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he allow the bill to be perfected before he insists on his point of order. The gentleman can reserve his point of order, if he wishes to do so, to the other two paragraphs.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; then if this paragraph is to be stricken out, I will reserve my point of order as to the remaining paragraphs.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move, then, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the paragraph in lines 652 and 653.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of commissioners, at $3,000 each, $15,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason why I move to strike out this paragraph is that provision has already been made by the Senate in the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation for the same purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of the officers of election, including contingent expenses, $25,000.

For expenses of the commission, for printing, stationery, clerical hire, and rent, $15,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order to those two paragraphs is that there is no law authorizing this expenditure of the public money. I submit to the Chair that when the bill for the suppression of polygamy was before the House the point of order that it involved an appropriation was overruled upon the ground that the appropriation was to come out of the treasury of Utah, and not out of the Treasury of the United States. I call on the gentleman from Kansas, who, I believe, is a member of the Appropriations Committee—I am told that he is not—nevertheless, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] will remember the ruling of the Chair on that occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers the decision of the Speaker in this sense, that it was a bill which did not necessarily require the expenditure to be paid out of the United States Treasury. It might be devolved upon the Treasury, but it did not necessarily require the expenditure to be paid out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. The third clause of Rule XXI goes beyond the rule in reference to a bill containing an appropriation of money or profit. It contains the word "involve," if I remember correctly—if it involves an appropriation of money. Therefore, if the bill did not involve an appropriation of money it could not be said incidentally it might require an appropriation, and therefore an appropriation would be in order under the third clause of the twenty-first rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether it is authorized by law or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have the ruling of the Chair read under which the bill for the suppression of polygamy was held not to be subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman whether he thinks that is necessary?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sent for the law itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have read the decision of the Chair on the bill for the suppression of polygamy and for other purposes, March 22, 1882. That decision was that the bill did not involve any appropriation.

Mr. MILLS. The law authorizing the appropriation said the salaries of the commissioners should be fixed at a certain sum, but did not go forward and make the appropriation.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was held that the expenses for carrying out that bill were to be paid out of the treasury of the Territory of Utah. That position was taken by the gentleman from Kansas and other gentlemen.

Mr. HASKELL. I said it did not require an appropriation of money to be made out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman said it was to be taken out of the treasury of Utah, and nothing was to be charged to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers the argument, but the arguments made by gentlemen then can have nothing to do with the decision of the Chair now after that bill has become a law.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true, but the House should be consistent. This bill never could have been considered at the time unless it was ruled that it involved nothing out of the Treasury of the United States. On the contrary, we were told that the bill was not to cost the Government of the United States anything. On that point the bill did not go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but was considered in open House. Now, after that ruling, that the bill was to cost nothing to the Government of the United States, we are called upon to pay all these expenses, on the ground, of course, that the ruling on the other case was an error. I am not sure that the chairman of the committee himself did not make an argument of that sort.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no recollection of doing so.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like to have the Chair advised of the previous decision before he rules on this subject.

Mr. HASKELL rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. That argument was made under the third clause of Rule XXIII of the House——

Mr. HASKELL. The argument made on this side of the House upon the point of order rested upon the third clause of Rule XXIII, wherein it is stated in these words: "or requiring such appropriation to be made;" and all the rest was ruled out. That was the only clause left to be considered. It was stated on the floor at that time by several members of the House in argument that that bill did not require an appropriation of money; and hence it did not come within that provision of the rule. Now, it did not require an appropriation. It did not compel an appropriation of money.

Mr. DUNN. It fixed the salary of the commissioners.

Mr. HASKELL. It did not require an appropriation of money. You cannot construe the bill as one which would compel the Government of the United States to appropriate money. There is no doubt about that point. But when, under that act passed at that time, a committee of this House, acting upon instructions of the House, or upon estimates from the Departments submitted to them, come in here and plead that that is the right way to handle this matter under this law, you will find there a warrant for the appropriation, though the bill itself did not originally compel it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Unless there is something in the law that compels the appropriation of money, of course then we are making a law when we pass the appropriation, and therefore in that sense, according to the gentleman's own statement, it is subject to the point of order for the reason——

Mr. HASKELL. Now, under the rules of this house, construed strictly and technically, and we have been held to these rules by that side of the House time and again, under one clause of the rule you have the bills which must have this first consideration in Committee of the Whole as requiring an appropriation, and under the other clause of the rule those which do not require it but which may warrant or authorize an appropriation. It was argued by gentlemen that this bill compelled an appropriation; that it required, under that clause, an appropriation of money. Now, there is a manifest difference between the two rules. This does not necessarily require an appropriation of money.

Mr. HOLMAN. It authorizes.

Mr. HASKELL. It would have been proper and legitimate and right for this Congress to have compelled the treasury of Utah to pay the expense of this commission under that bill. The law itself which was passed did not provide for the payment of the commission out of the general Treasury. I so stated during the discussion of the bill that it did one of two things, either required the payment out of the Treasury of the United States, or that after the bill was passed the Territory of Utah might have been compelled to pay it. I stated that there was no compulsion on the part of the General Government requiring it to pay the money.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to call the attention of the gentleman back to the question of order, which is the only question before the Chair at this time; that is, whether this be an appropriation to carry out an existing law; and an argument on a point of order made before the Speaker on the bill known as the Utah bill throws no light upon that point.

Mr. HASKELL. It throws no light upon it whatever. That Utah bill was discussed under the third clause of Rule XXIII, in which the words occur which I have referred to, requiring such appropriation to be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Or authorizing such appropriation.

Mr. HASKELL. "Requiring" is the language of the rule, and that was the clause under which the point of order was discussed on that bill. But what is it now? What is the question that is pending before us? Here is an appropriation bill reported from a regular committee of this House, a committee authorized to frame such a bill, in which this clause appropriating money for the support of certain machinery of election in Utah—machinery provided by law—is embodied. Now, then, under this third clause of Rule XXIII, if this was brought in as an independent proposition, that point of order might lie against it; but it is taken from under the operation of that clause, and it is now under the third clause of Rule XXI, where provision is made that no appropriation shall be reported unless previously authorized by law. You have then the warrant of law, being the original bill, giving authority to the Committee on Appropriations to put this thing into this bill. It is entirely competent for the committee to do so. There is the warrant of law for it. The trouble with gentlemen is that under one rule of the House when a bill is before the House one rule affects it; but when it is in an appropriation bill, and they seek to have it stricken out, they must apply another rule, which did not apply to the original proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas is too fair minded a man to give emphasis to a word that has no application at all. The language of the rule is: "requiring or authorizing the payment of money." Now that bill, it was alleged, did authorize a payment of money out of the public Treasury. It was held by the Chair at that time that it did not. So, under that ruling, it did not go to the Committee of the Whole. Then, if a bill is passed which does not authorize an expenditure of money, how can it be possible for an appropriation of money to be carried into effect in an appropriation bill when the point of order is made against it that the law itself does not authorize the expenditure of the money out of the public Treasury? It seems to me that that position is very clear. But I call the attention of the Chair to the third clause of Rule XXIII, under which language the ruling to which I refer was had, and the Chair will see that if that bill did not authorize the expenditure of money from the public Treasury but did authorize it from the treasury of Utah, that then there is no law authorizing an appropriation from the public Treasury, inasmuch as that law does not authorize it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order. The Chair thinks that gentlemen have failed to regard the question in the two different lights in which it appears. The former question was as to the reference of a bill and the necessity of its consideration in the Committee of the Whole. Even had the Speaker and the whole House been wrong in refusing to refer to the Committee of the Whole, still the question here would remain the same, whether this proposed appropriation is for the execution of and giving effect to an existing law. The Chair turns to the law—and there is no question as to its existence—and finds it requires a certain duty as to the registration of voters and various work to be done in the execution of the law by these commissioners. The Chair then turns to the bill, and the clauses proposed to be stricken out he finds are appropriations for expenses necessarily incurred in executing the law. It is not a question whether the original law authorized expenditures, or, in the sense of the rule, means expenditures may be incurred without waiting for an appropriation. The question now is of appropriating for executing the provisions of existing law, and the title itself declares it to be to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of the act. The Chair rules that the clauses are in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. But is it necessary to make appropriations to carry out the provisions of an act when the act did not require appropriations?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a question of the act authorizing an appropriation—this is the act authorizing an appropriation—but the question is, is it a law that makes it necessary for Congress to make the appropriation?

Mr. SPRINGER. We were told at the time this law was enacted that it did not make an appropriation necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not responsible for what occurred in the debate. If there is a law which requires money to execute it, it is in order to appropriate money for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am glad the Chair is able to explain this so satisfactorily. I quite agree the Chair is correct in his ruling; but that was not the decision of the House or the ruling of the Chair at that time.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the heading of "Alaskan seal fisheries:"

For two assistant agents, at $2,190 each, $4,380.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

A few years ago it was thought sufficient to have a single agent at the seal fisheries in Alaska. The committee of conference in the Forty-fourth Congress, finding that two agents were employed, consented to strike out, in conformity with the views of the House, the appropriation for a larger salary, leaving out the one agent. Now it seems that by this appropriation bill there is one principal agent with a salary of $3,650; one assistant agent with a salary of $2,920, and two assistant agents at $2,190 each, making $4,380.

I am very greatly mistaken—I think I am not—if, in the Forty-fourth Congress, upon a careful examination and upon knowledge obtained mainly through gentlemen who had visited those remote islands, employed to do so by the Secretary of the Treasury, it was not deemed entirely sufficient during the comparatively short period of the year the agent was detained there that one agent alone should be employed on the two islands, St. George and St. Paul. I have not had occasion to look into the subject lately, but I am confident there was no pretense at that time that under the circumstances more than two agents were required, one upon the smaller island and one upon the larger.

Now, it seems that in a very few years the number has grown up to four different employés, and that the salaries have swollen up to nearly $11,000. If there has been any examination made of that subject since that time, and new information received from good, responsible sources, I am not aware of it. But I say with entire confidence to the committee, that in the Forty-fourth Congress the Congress had an opportunity of obtaining very accurate information on the subject of the extent to which superintendents were required.

What is the duty to be performed? They are simply to see there is not a larger number of pelts than is authorized by law, namely, 100,000—75,000, I believe, from one island and 25,000 from another. No other duty devolves upon these agents; but their number has now swollen up to four. I move to strike out the last paragraph providing for the two assistant agents.

Mr. HISCOCK. At this session, I say very frankly to the gentleman from Indiana, this question was not investigated at all. I do remember that upon an item in a deficiency bill in the Forty-sixth Congress it was fully and thoroughly investigated; and I think the gentleman from Indiana himself will concede that the Appropriations Committee of the Forty-sixth Congress never created any more offices or paid larger salaries than were proper. The matter was investigated at that time. I was familiar with the investigation, and the committee this year have adopted the law and have given precisely what was given last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that only a pro forma amendment was offered and that it is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the protection of sea-otter hunting grounds and seal-fisheries in Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to use revenue steamers for the protection of the interests of the Government on the seal-islands and the sea-otter hunting-grounds, and the enforcement of the provisions of law in Alaska, $25,000.

Mr. HILL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 691 insert the following:

"That the sum of $50,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended by the Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the use of schools at such points in Alaska as may be designated by the Commissioner of Education."

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order upon that amendment. This is certainly new legislation. It properly belongs to the Committee on Territories or the Committee on Indian Affairs. There is no law organizing schools there under which this amendment would be in order.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman reserve for a few moments the point of order?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the President, on the 15th of February last, transmitted to Congress a communication from the Secretary of the Interior recommending an appropriation of $50,000 for education in Alaska; and also the report and recommendation of the same amount by Commissioner Eaton, of the Bureau of Education, which I submit to the House and shall incorporate them with my remarks.

The papers referred to by Mr. HILL are as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a letter from the Commissioner of Education, in which the recommendation is made that an appropriation of $50,000 be made for the purpose of education in Alaska.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 15, 1882.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 8, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for your consideration, a letter from the Commissioner of Education, in which he recommends that an appropriation of $50,000 be made for the establishment and maintenance of schools in Alaska.

I concur in the recommendation that the appropriation be made.

Very respectfully,

S. J. KIRKWOOD,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, February 4, 1882.

SIR: My attention is called to the provisions of the law determining the purpose and duties of this office, which provides that it shall "collect statistics and facts showing the condition and progress of education in the several States and Territories, and to diffuse such information respecting the organization and management of schools and school systems and methods of teaching as shall aid the people of the United States in the establishment and maintenance of efficient school systems and otherwise promote the cause of education throughout the country;" and it is affirmed that I have not yet made any specific recommendation with regard to education in Alaska. I cannot claim to be ignorant of the fact that there is no law either for the protection of life or property or for the establishment of schools in that Territory, nor would I be among those who are indifferent to facts reflecting so unfavorably upon us as a people. I have sought diligently to gather all information in regard to the education of the children of Alaskans, as will be seen by reference to the several reports of this office. Prior to the purchase of Alaska the Russian Government had schools in portions of that country. When it was transferred to the United States those schools were generally discontinued, and the entire Territory, with few exceptions, has been left without any means of education. From the census of 1880 we learn that there are about 30,000 people in Alaska, and of these it is believed there are about 10,000 children or young people who ought to have some school privileges.

With regard to this people, it may be observed—

1. That they are docile, peaceful, and have here and there some knowledge of useful industries; are apt in the mechanical arts, and anxious for instruction.

2. They are a self-supporting people, needing no annuities, clothing, or rations from the Government, but do need teachers that they cannot procure for themselves. These teachers should instruct them, not only in letters, but in the arts of civilized life and the duties of American citizenship.

3. If given an opportunity for this kind of instruction for a few years they would, it is believed, make good progress in throwing off tribal relations and in preparation to become an integral portion of the American people, thus contributing to the common wealth and prosperity of the country.

4. It is well known that civilization in approaching an untutored people may be their destruction by sending its vices before its virtues. It is equally well known that various weeds spring up spontaneously where useful plants must be cultivated, and that not neglect but painstaking care is necessary to the improvement of the human mind.

The people of Alaska having received some measure of aid from the Russian Government have expected the same from the United States. The natives, already to a limited extent demoralized by the introduction of intemperance and disease, it is thought would, by the introduction of schools, be prepared better to resist these evils and stand a far better chance to be a permanent and prosperous race.

5. The development of the fishing interests, the discovery of gold, and the increase of commerce in that region are now calling public attention to it, and the time seems to have arrived when school privileges should be immediately provided. In 1870 Congress appropriated $50,000 for educational purposes in Alaska, which, on account of difficulties of administration at that time, was not expended there. This amount could now be expended there, I am sure, with most satisfactory results.

In accordance, therefore, with these considerations, and in order not to come short of any duty required of me by law, I have the honor to recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate $50,000 for the establishment and maintenance of schools for instruction in letters and industry, at such points in Alaska as shall be designated by the honorable Secretary of the Interior.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN EATON, Commissioner.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. HILL. There is in Alaska a population of 30,000; about 10,000 children and young people growing up, willing to attend school and only glad when they can have the opportunity to be educated. I believe the best way for us in this country to get along with this class of people, such as we have in Alaska, is to educate them, and to train them properly and in the right direction.

The school-houses are there, in many parts of the Territory, the buildings in which these children can be received and educated, but they have not the teachers. What they want is the spelling-book, the reader, and such other books as are necessary, and the teacher to give them instructions in the English branches of study, which, as they grow up will help to make good citizens of them.

I am aware that there is no Territorial organization in Alaska, as there ought to be, by which these people can be protected. But I believe this will be a step in the direction of giving a territorial organization there. As the population increases the demands for a government will increase.

We appropriate money for the seal fisheries and for the Army to keep up the military posts. Why not give them schools and a good system of education, and also an organized government to regulate their own affairs? This matter has been brought to my attention during the past winter, urging action on the part of Congress, and this Congress ought not to adjourn until they have taken action and given the people of Alaska a territorial form of government, and it would seem to be a very poor policy not to do something to educate the children and the youths that are growing up there, and who will by and by become citizens of this country. If we are to expect good from them instead of evil we should make provision for their education.

The English language is taught in all the schools in Alaska that are open at the present time, and sustained by private enterprise. There is a population of fully 20,000 without any educational advantages whatever. We have seen it stated that—

Among a few of the native tribes of the United States there is no wish for schools, and it is with great difficulty that the children can be persuaded to attend. But not so in Southeastern Alaska. Wherever a school has been opened it has been filled at once with children eager to learn.

I believe in education, and whenever there is a desire and willingness on the part of the people poor and destitute of means to educate themselves, to improve the opportunities afforded them to learn, effort should be made to aid them. The cause of humanity, the cause of Christianity, and the cause of civilization demand it. These people have been handed over to us by the Russian Government when the territory came into the possession of the United States, and it is the duty of this Government to educate them—the only true way to civilize and make good citizens of them. It is better than the sword and the rifle, and money appropriated for this purpose will do far more good than establishing military posts at great expense to the Government as is done at the present time.

This subject has excited of late a good deal of attention.

In 1867 Alaska with its inhabitants became a part of the United States. The schools sustained by the fur company, representing the Russian Government, were disbanded. It was reasonable, however to suppose that 30,000 people would be much better off and have better schools under American than Russian rule. It was but reasonable to expect that the United States, that bases its continued existence upon the intelligence of its citizens and glories in its common-school system, would replace the disbanded Russian schools with those of a higher grade and improved methods; that a people who, through their State systems, practically furnish a free education to all, and through their General Government appropriate thousands of dollars annually for Indian education and civilization, would not neglect to extend school privileges to the natives of their latest acquired territory; for, whatever may have been the views held as to the expediency of the purchase, all will admit that, having acquired, the Government is bound to care for it.

But these reasonable and just expectations have not been realized. The Government, with two exceptions, has done nothing.

Major-General O. O. Howard, who was in command of that military division in 1869, said:

As the military authority is now held responsible for Indian affairs in Alaska, I have thought it best to make a full statement of my observations with the hope that speedy legislation may be had to give to our Indians there, as well as others already said to be in advance of others in point of intelligence, certainly as good opportunities in the way of government and instruction as those have in contiguous British territory.

Commander L. A. Beardslee to the honorable Secretary of the Navy, Senate Executive Document No. 105, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, page 12:

It is my judgment that we will best serve American interests by so teaching and cultivating this race as to win their confidence and get them to recognize us as their friends whom it is their interest to serve.

William H. Dall, esq., Smithsonian Institution, in a letter with reference to a government for Alaska, says:

Ten per cent. of the revenue of the United States from the territory for the year preceding the current year should be applied to free schools under the Bureau of Education, by the superintendent of public instruction, at the most populous centers, and the commanders of cruisers should be authorized to enlist into the Navy native Alaskans when they might show themselves suitable for the duties required.

Ex-President Hayes, in his last message to Congress, December 1, 1880, says:

The problem is to supply the territory for a population so scattered and so peculiar in its origin and condition. The natives are reported to be tractable and self-supporting, and if properly instructed doubtless would advance rapidly in civilization, and a new factor of prosperity would be added to the national life. I therefore recommend the requisite legislation upon this subject.

President Arthur, December 6, 1881, says, in his message to Congress:

I regret to state that the people of Alaska have reason to complain that they are as yet unprovided with any form of government by which life or property can be protected. While the extent of its population does not justify the application of the costly machinery of territorial administration, there is immediate necessity for constituting such a form of government as will promote the education of the people and secure the administration of justice.

Our late lamented President, Garfield, was deeply interested in this subject of educating the people of Alaska, and presented to the House of Representatives on the 2d of February, 1880, the following memorial:

A memorial to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

Whereas the United States is responsible for the proper care and government of Alaska, the native inhabitants of which and creoles of mixed blood are docile, peaceful, partially civilized, apt in the mechanical arts, and anxious for instruction; and

Whereas it is believed to be the wise policy as well as duty of the Government to adopt prompt measures for their education, with a view to their admission to the rights of citizenship; and

Whereas it is both cheaper and more humane to give them educational facilities now than to fight them hereafter at a largely increased cost; and

Whereas they are a self-supporting people, needing no annuities, clothing, or rations from the Government, but do need teachers, which they cannot procure for themselves; and

Whereas the Government receives an annual revenue from Alaska of $317,500, and only returns to that country in the form of salaries of United States officers, pay of monthly mail steamer, support of steam revenue-cutter, &c., the sum of about $65,000, leaving a net revenue of over $250,000; Therefore,

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, do hereby memorialize your honorable body to appropriate from the revenue of Alaska in the Treasury the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended by the Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, for the establishment under competent teachers of schools for the instruction of the native population and creoles of Alaska in the English language, the common branches of an English education, the principles of a republican government, and such industrial pursuits as may seem best adapted to their circumstances.

We find also a letter from the late Senator Burnside showing the interest he manifested in the cause of education in Alaska. Writing to a friend, he says:

SENATE CHAMBER, Washington, March 16, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly send me any pamphlets or circular you may have published touching the condition of affairs in Alaska. I am interested in having a system of education established there.

Very truly, yours,

A. E. BURNSIDE,
United States Senator.

These people have a claim on the United States Government, and the action already taken by the Government is certainly of such a character as to demand aid and assistance to maintain education and keep open their schools.

Russia transferred to the United States (see Diplomatic Correspondence, 1867, part 1, pages 404 and 405) "dock-yards, barracks, hospitals, and schools." Also in the inventory of property turned over occurs "school-building of timber, with its appurtenances," at Sitka; "a timber building for school," at Kadiak.

In 1870, Congress, by an act approved July 1, leased the seal Islands to the Alaska Commercial Company for a period of twenty years. In section 6 of said act occur these words:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby empowered and authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for the collection and payment of the same, for the comfort, maintenance, education, and protection of the natives of said islands.

In the regulations of the company for the guidance of their employés section 15 reads:

Free schools will be maintained by the company eight months in each year, four hours per day, Sundays and holidays excepted, and agents and teachers will endeavor to secure the attendance of all. The company will furnish the necessary books, stationery, and other appliances for the use of the schools without cost to the people.

It is plain from the action taken that the education of the people was one of the principal matters to be looked after.

It is said that this amendment is out of order, because there is no law to allow this appropriation to come under the provisions of this bill now before the House. If that is so, then it is time we had some law or some definite action was taken by Congress to meet a demand so just and necessary as this one is, and not only appropriate money for education in Alaska, but to give them a territorial form of government to help them regulate their affairs in the same manner and on the same terms as the other Territories of the country, and which is so heartily indorsed by the President in his message December 6, 1881, of which an extract is given above.

In the interest of civilization and good government, education and religion, I ask that this appropriation be granted, that the 10,000 children and youth be educated. No appropriations made by Congress are more important to the country at large than those granted for educational purposes. Its importance cannot be overestimated. The last census shows that there are 6,000,000 of the people of this country cannot read or write—one-eighth of the population of the country—a fearful exhibit. Yet they are figures that are true, staring us in the face, and speak loudly to the country, and ought to rouse up every member of this House to examine carefully the whole subject of education, and see to it that the destitute portions of the country are provided with schools, that the humble poor boys and girls of this favored land shall have instruction given them in all the branches of the English language, and if they have nothing else they shall have the legacy of a good common school education.

I hope the point of order will not be insisted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not point to any law authorizing such an expenditure, to any law establishing schools in that region.

Mr. HILL. If the members of the House will take the trouble to examine Senate Executive Document No. 30, they will find out what is going on in the way of education in Alaska; that schools are now being carried on there.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is whether they are paid for by the United States Government.

Mr. HILL. They are not, but they ought to be; that is what I want to have done; and there should be more schools and a thorough system of education established in the Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the case made out by the gentleman the Chair is obliged to rule the amendment out of order, while appreciating the object as much as the gentleman himself can do.

The Clerk read the following:

For salaries and expenses of the National Board of Health, as follows:
For pay and expenses of the members of the National Board of Health, $10,000.
For pay of secretary and disbursing agent, and pay of clerks, messengers, and laborers, $5,500.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to amend the last clause just read by striking out "$5,500" and inserting "$17,500." The machinery of the National Board of Health would be entirely crippled with this inadequate appropriation of $5,000.

It is well known to the members of this House that the National Board of Health stamped out the epidemic of yellow fever a few years since. With the large increase of immigration now coming to this country, there is imminent danger that not only small-pox, but diphtheria, typhus fever, and scarlatina will be brought in by the immigrants and spread throughout the country. It will require the whole power of the National Board of Health as now organized to make an efficient resistance to the spread of those contagious diseases. I ask the Clerk to read a statement handed me by the secretary of the National Board of Health.

The Clerk read as follows:

Weekly reports of mortality and other information relating to the sanitary condition of those places are received from two hundred and fifty towns in the United States and from nearly one hundred and fifty consulates.

Under section 4 of the act approved June 2, 1879, these reports and all other pertinent information are required to be arranged, published, and transmitted weekly to members of Congress, medical officers of the Army and Navy, United States consuls, State officers, boards of health, &c., &c. To comply with this requirement of the law 5,000 copies of the Bulletin are required at an annual cost of $9,500 for printing. The preparation of the Bulletin, mailing, noting, and arranging the large number of printed papers and documents received requires the constant attention of three men, with such assistance as can be rendered by two messengers, together with most of the time of one person charged with the preparation of all reading matter and the general supervision of the work. It is impossible to perform the labor and issue the paper weekly with a less number of employés than are now engaged upon it.

It is proposed that this work shall be placed in charge of an inspector, who shall act as disbursing agent, and be subject to detail for such other duties as may be required, at a salary of $3,000 per annum.

The clerks on this duty are as follows:
One clerk, class 3, $1,600 per annum.
One clerk, class 1, $1,200 per annum.
One clerk, $500 per annum.

The general correspondence of the office requires one stenographer, who also takes the minutes of the board and of the executive committee, paid as clerk of class 4, $1,800 per annum.

One bookkeeper, in charge of accounts, clerk of class 4, $1,800 per annum.
One clerk of class 3, in charge of files and records, $1,600 per annum.
One clerk, class 2, assistant corresponding clerk, $1,400 per annum.
One clerk, employed in preparing copies of minutes for transmission to members of the board, and in making copies of circulars required to be sent out and which do not require to be printed, at $1,000 per annum.
One copyist, employed in copying records, $900 per annum.
One messenger, $720 per annum.
One laborer, at $500 per annum.

In addition to the expense for clerks, messengers, and laborers, the board is authorized, under section 5 of the act of July 1, 1879, to pay the secretary $100 per month and the disbursing agent $300 per annum.

The items above set forth aggregate $17,520, and the number of employés indicated is the smallest that can possibly perform the labor required to be done under the law, and the work, much of it technical in character, is such that the salaries named are as low as they can be placed and enable the board to secure competent service.

The amount ($2,000) proposed in the bill for rent, light, fuel, furniture, stationery, telegrams, and postage is entirely inadequate.

	Per annum.
Rent now paid	$1,200 00
Estimated for light	200 00
Estimated for fuel	200 00
Estimated for postage	500 00
Estimated for stationery	1,000 00
Estimated for telegrams	800 00
Estimated for furniture	600 00
Total	4,500 00

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. VAN AERNAM; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For rent, light, fuel, furniture, stationery, telegrams, and postage, $2,000.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$4,000." The statement just read by the Clerk shows fully the necessity for this increase of appropriation.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move to add to the clause last read "and $9,500 for printing the Weekly Bulletin." There are 5,000 copies of this bulletin published weekly, under the law passed in 1879. These Bulletins are sent to the municipal authorities of the several States and to consulates throughout the world. They have been not only of great value and service in preventing the spread of epidemic diseases in this country but also have been beneficial in other countries.

There is in this bill no fund for the continuance of the publication of these Bulletins. The absolute expense of printing these Weekly Bulletins and mailing and distributing them would be $9,500, the sum I have named in this amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For aid to State and local boards of health and to local quarantine stations in carrying out their rules and regulations to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious and infectious diseases in the United States, $25,000: Provided, That no other public money than that hereby appropriated shall be expended for the purposes of the Board of Health: And provided further, That hereafter the duties and investigations of the Board of Health shall be confined to the diseases of cholera and yellow fever.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I raise the point of order on the two provisos in the paragraph just read, commencing in line 711.

Mr. HISCOCK. What is the point of order that is made?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made against the two provisos in the paragraph just read.

Mr. HISCOCK. Both provisos retrench expenditures. The first proviso is, "that no other public money than that hereby appropriated shall be expended for the purposes of the Board of Health." That retrenches the expenditure of money. The second proviso is, "that hereafter the duties and investigations of the Board of Health shall be confined to the diseases of cholera and yellow fever." That restricts the duties of the Board of Health.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman a little further on the point whether there is necessarily any retrenchment of expenditures involved in these provisos. The Chair would inquire what appropriation is affected by the first proviso; whether there is any public money now being expended that will not be expended should this proviso be adopted?

Mr. HISCOCK. I think there is. From the investigation which we made I believe there is an appropriation for this purpose which may be regarded as continuing—an unexpended balance. This provision corresponds with the language in the bill of last year, and there is an unexpended balance to which it applies.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what is the necessity for restricting this investigation to the two diseases named?

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman desire to discuss that question now, or after the point of order has been disposed of?

Mr. CONVERSE. I was going to move to strike out the last proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair repeats that the only difficulty he has is that there does not necessarily appear any retrenchment of expenditure in the second proviso; and as to the first proviso it does not appear to what it applies.

Mr. HISCOCK. The antecedent language of this bill carries an appropriation. Now, the restricting of the labors of the board must of necessity decrease the amount which will be expended. Without this restriction its investigations might extend to all sorts of diseases everywhere.

I will add that it is always competent in making an appropriation of money to limit the use to which it shall be applied. The clause commencing in line 713 is a limitation of the uses to which previous appropriations may be applied.

The CHAIRMAN. The difficulty of the Chair is that is does not appear that the language of the proviso will diminish the expenditure at all. A certain amount is appropriated by the bill; and no more can be expended, whether the board investigates half a dozen diseases or a single one. The proviso does seem to change existing law under which the board might investigate other contagious diseases, smallpox, &c.; but as there is no limitation of the amount which may be expended in the investigation of any particular disease, it does not appear that there will be less expended by the investigation of one or two diseases than if there were no such limitation.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the duties of the board be limited, it may not perhaps be necessary to spend all the appropriation provided in this bill. If you decrease the amount of work, very likely the amount of money appropriated may not be exhausted. We are not to assume that every dollar of appropriation carried in the bill is to be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regards the first proviso as in order. The second proviso he prefers to submit to the decision of the committee. The question is, Shall the point of order raised upon the second proviso as embracing new legislation be sustained? That proviso is in these words:

That hereafter the duties and investigations of the Board of Health shall be confined to the diseases of cholera and yellow fever.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to amend by striking out the last proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised by the gentleman from New York upon the proviso must be decided unless the gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair submits to the Committee of the Whole the question whether the point of order shall be sustained.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. CONVERSE I now move to amend by striking out the last proviso. If any portion of this fund is to be appropriated to State or local boards of health for the purpose of preventing the spread of infectious diseases, I cannot see why the action of such boards should be limited to the two diseases named. I would be glad to be informed on this point

Mr. COX, of New York. This Board of Health was established when yellow fever was prevailing in a part of our country; and there was a great demand upon our sympathies to create this board in order to protect the people of the Southern States. Since that time the reasons that called for the creation of that board have ceased; and the board is now, as I believe, utterly useless. The Appropriations Committee, however, have not seen proper as yet to cut it up radically. They have done what they could to limit its action to the two diseases, cholera and yellow fever. The board was organized with special reference to diseases of that character; it has served its purpose. If a vote had been taken in the Committee on Appropriations, I think they would have decided to cut up the board by the roots. I hope in time to see this institution thoroughly eradicated from our system. It is made up of a few doctors who undertake to run a doctor's shop in this city, interfering with commerce all over the country. Not only do they interfere with our local quarantine, the officers of which are doing their duty well, but in my judgment, and in the judgment also of the marine board of health, they are doing no possible good in preventing disease from coming into the country.

I would offer, if I could now do so properly, an amendment to turn over all the matters coming under consideration of this Board of Health to the Marine-Hospital Service, at whose head is Dr. Hamilton, a just man and an accomplished physician, who would not use his office for the purpose of official aggrandizement, or for the purpose of drawing salaries without adequate consideration rendered.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be carried to strike out the proviso restricting the National Board of Health in its investigations to the diseases of cholera and yellow fever. I think that was a proper and necessary limitation placed on the investigations of this board, for, as the gentleman from New York has just stated, the Board of Health, originated only a few years ago in consequence of——

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment to make an inquiry of the Chair, at what hour the House is to adjourn this afternoon?

The CHAIRMAN. At five o'clock.

Mr. ATKINS. I was proceeding to remark, Mr. Chairman, that it originated on account of the recent visitations of yellow fever to the southern section of the country.

I imagine there is scarcely any gentleman who resides on the Mississippi River, at least from Cairo and perhaps Saint Louis down, who would be willing to see this Board of Health entirely destroyed. Mr. Chairman, it has been of incalculable advantage to the southern country. A very small appropriation is made here to continue it. It may not have been economical in some of its practices. I doubt not if that charge were made it would be sustained, but it has been of great benefit—no doubt about that—to the country in keeping out yellow fever in the last two or three years.

There has been already this year one case of yellow fever in the city of New Orleans, and connected as that city is by river and rail it can easily be seen what the result would be if the disease should once spread.

Mr. DUNN. There have been several cases at Key West.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Arkansas tells me there have been several cases at Key West. There has been one case this year already at New Orleans, and that city, connected as it is with all the upper country and connected by rail, if the yellow fever should prevail in New Orleans there is no sort of doubt it would reach Memphis and all the cities between Memphis and New Orleans, and perhaps go up as high as Cairo.

I remember two or three years ago having a conversation with a distinguished member of the board of health, and he then said to me that if yellow fever should once get a foot-hold in the city of Baltimore it would decimate that city; that in his opinion it was the finest field for it of any city in the Union, and that a city, too, in as high a latitude as Baltimore. There is no city in this country exempt from the scourge of yellow fever, if once it gets a foot-hold in it, until cold weather comes. If it should get into Cincinnati or Louisville, or any city in that latitude, until cold weather came it would be impossible to rid the city of it. Now, with such a small appropriation as this, at least until we pass over two or three years further, this appropriation should be continued, so that if yellow fever should reach our shores we would have a board of health to meet it, and that they would meet it successfully there is no doubt.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is not proposed to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. ATKINS. I know that, but I also know the prejudice in this House against the National Board of Health. My friend from New York who sits to my right has just made some remarks on the subject, the tenor of which was against the whole bureau.

I am not in favor of magnifying bureaus nor am I in favor of creating any new ones. I think this country is suffering with the disease of bureaucracy. I have no doubt about that, but this is one of the bureaus at this juncture I am not willing to see struck down; I am not willing that should be done in view of the health of the country north, south, east, and west.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I think the bill as it now stands, limited to cholera and yellow fever, is right, for the reason that it is in accordance with the purpose Congress had in view in all the legislation heretofore enacted for the establishment of a National Board of Health. The first proposition grew out of the appearance of yellow fever in my own State, in the city of Savannah. An appropriation of $50,000 was made, and subsequently the yellow fever broke out at Memphis, Tennessee, and other cities in the country, and then the Representatives on this floor from all sections of the country, with a humanity that gladdened the people of my own section and other sections afflicted by this scourge, came forward with a second bill, appropriating $50,000, and further provided that sum of money should not go back into the Treasury, but should stand for a period of five years to be used for the purpose of meeting attacks of yellow fever and cholera. It was not intended to fix on us the National Board of Health, but to place in the hands of the Government funds to be used in the event cholera or yellow fever should break out.

Now, sir, what was the result? Immediately following this the National Board of Health, with this sort of statute, taking effect on the 1st of July of that year, went to work, and when we reached here in December we found it had made contracts not only consuming the whole $500,000, but they had to come forward and ask for a deficiency of $300,000 or $400,000. The first thing we knew they were investigating measles and chicken-pox and all sorts of diseases in all the cities of this Union, when it was directly in conflict with the purpose of Congress.

Mr. STEELE. Why not investigate small-pox as well as cholera and yellow fever?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not time of course to go into all the reasons, but I wish simply to call my friend's attention to the purpose Congress had in view in making the appropriation. It was never intended to create a board of health to take into consideration all of these diseases; but it was created simply for the purpose of looking to some means of preventing the introduction and spread of the great scourges of cholera and yellow fever, and nothing more. Now it is attempted on the part of the Board of Health to build up a great system, embracing every State in this Union, under the control of a central bureau here. That is what I am opposed to, and from the time of the creation of this board until now the Committee on Appropriations and the House, on both sides, have, by various acts of legislation and restriction, attempted to restrain the fixed purpose which was clearly exhibited of building up this bureau. I trust, sir, that the Committee on Appropriations of the House will be sustained in endeavoring to make this bill harmonize with the purpose of Congress when it created this Board of Health. I hope it will be kept within the original limits designed by the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DUNN. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to allow some of the statements which have been made to go to the country unchallenged. The gentleman from New York has stated that this board has already ceased to be useful; and one of the first reasons which he assigns in support of that view is that it interferes with the local commerce of the country. Now, that is one of the very reasons why I have always favored the creation of a National Board of Health. It is well known to all those who live in the regions which are likely to be affected by these plagues of cholera and yellow fever that the local boards of health in their endeavors to prevent the spread of the diseases frequently come in conflict with the commercial influences, and that the commercial people resist that rigid quarantine which alone is adequate and effective to prevent the spread of such diseases. We all know that in 1878, when our country was scourged with that dreadful plague of yellow fever, the railroads, in defiance of the attempts to regulate traffic with the infected district, kept up their communication with New Orleans and in that way spread that disease, like a consuming plague of fire, all over the country. There was not a village, not a hamlet, not a woodyard or shanty on the line of that railroad that was not scourged by the pestilence. Now, this National Board of Health has the power, under the general law, of overcoming such local influences as that and maintaining an effective system of quarantine.

The argument of the gentleman from Georgia is not entitled to that high consideration to which the arguments made by him are usually entitled on this floor. It looks only to the question of economy; and he says that Board of Health came in with a large amount of deficiency, and that they investigated the matter, &c. But let the gentleman remember that if that board had been created in time and had the power which it should have had, it would have been able to deal with and arrest the disaster of 1878 and 1879, and have saved the country from the desolating scourge which then afflicted it.

Is the gentleman willing to stand here and weigh out dollars and cents and the money cost of preventing such a pestilence against the lives of our citizens? Is he willing to weigh money in the scale against human life? Why should the Board of Health be abolished or its powers limited? Have these diseases been abolished? Do not dispatches and the public press tell us to-day that there are some sixty cases, daily and weekly, of yellow fever now in Havana, and that it is epidemic, or about to be declared so?

Do we not know that it has already in fact reached our own shores; that there was a case in Brooklyn but a few days ago on a ship there, and some cases at Key West and at New Orleans, and that our whole coast is defenseless? Is he willing to leave human life to the mercy of commercial cupidity or under the influence of the merchants and the railroads, by which our whole borders will be laid open to the invasion of that fearful pestilence? I am in favor of increasing the efficiency of that board.

If the marine boards can do the work better than this, show that to be a fact and let us change the law; but in God's name let somebody have the power to overcome these local commercial influences to relieve the country of the presence or of the danger of an epidemic, which we have so often had cause to deplore.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if this last provision is not stricken from the bill it is my purpose to offer an amendment to at least include the investigation of small-pox with the other two diseases mentioned. At a late meeting of the State board of health of Illinois, held in Chicago, they passed a resolution asking the Representatives of that State in Congress to favor the supervision, on the part of the national board, regarding these diseases. They made this point, that in view of the large immigration of people from all parts of the world into the different parts of the United States and into all of the States there shoud be a national center, and in communication with the different State boards of the United States, in order that there may be harmonious action on the part of all of these different boards. This proposition, Mr. Chairman, does, as I understand it, propose no increase of the appropriations here, but simply provides some means of making it possible that the national board, which it is proposed to keep in existence by this law, (and I think it would be very unwise in us to abolish it now, because there happens to be no general epidemic prevailing,) shall have extended powers to meet the objects for which it was created; and I wish to say right here that only last winter, when the scourge of small-pox spread abroad over our State, our citizens realized the great value of our State board in circumscribing and stamping out the disease in that State.

Our citizens then awoke to its importance, and this same State board now instructs us, their Representatives in Congress, as I have said before, to see to it. What assurance have we that a great epidemic may not be upon us this summer? Why despise it now? We should be liberal enough to prepare in times of health for the times of disease that may come upon us. What assurance have we that after Congress shall have adjourned, after its members shall be scattered all over the country, these epidemics may not again invade our shores? Why should we be so picayunish as to sit here, two hundred and ninety-three members of Congress, to refuse a paltry few thousand dollars for these men who shall have this supervision over the State organizations, if you please—or if not supervision, who shall at least be able to co-operate with these State organizations?

There is on the Speaker's table a bill which has passed the Senate providing that the National Board of Health shall put its stamp upon vaccine virus in order that the people may know when they purchase it that it is pure. The bill has passed the Senate and is on the Speaker's table. I hope when it is reached it will also pass the House. This is necessary legislation. It is in the interest of the people and is desired by the people. Since the introduction of that bill many resolutions and petitions have been sent to us—I have received many of them myself—asking that it may become a law.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will my friend allow me to make a single suggestion?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. With pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is that the State board of health of the State of Illinois at this same meeting, referred to by my colleague, also set forth the beneficial effects of the law of the United States during the prevalence of small-pox last year.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask what Illinoisian has been recommended, if any, for appointment in connection with the duties of the National Board of Health?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say that the members of our State board are men who are above reflection.

Mr. CANNON. I made no reflection on the State board. I was merely asking for information.

Mr. COX, of New York. I offer a formal amendment to say a word or two in response to what fell from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SMITH.] So far as small-pox is concerned, the disease is easily manageable. By local treatment and local methods it can always be managed, and that is the only way in which it can be managed. Why not manage it as the local boards of Massachusetts do? When there is any contagious disease, small-pox or any other, in Massachusetts, they have a way, according to their old system of government, of isolating the disease. And so it was in Mobile and other cities South. Before this board was raised by the Federal Congress they did not suffer the effects which other cities suffered, because they took a local interest in all these matters to prevent contagion and infection.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. What would you say, then, in regard to the proposition, which is true, that Chicago, for instance, is daily receiving thousands of immigrants, and many of them diseased?

Mr. COX, of New York. I will say this to the gentleman, and I say it triumphantly, that the port of New York has a perfect local quarantine by which no diseases, contagious or infectious, have been sent into our city, as was the case twenty-five or thirty years ago. We have a guard against such dissemination of disease.

I say further to the gentleman, when I made the remark I would not have commerce disturbed I had in my mind the fact that there is a provision in this bill, the preceding provision which the Committee on Appropriations has reported, authorizing $100,000 to be appropriated and used by the President of the United States when these diseases are either threatening to be epidemic or when the epidemic actually occurs. That is on page 29 of the bill. The President is there authorized to use this large sum from the Treasury for the purpose of preventing and suppressing the spread of the disease.

But the gentleman from Illinois and others would enlarge this bureau, would give it more power, would let it go into all the ramifications of the country to interfere with local boards, and of course he has the support of the local boards who are willing to depend on this board here; and of course gentlemen from the South feel grateful, like my friend from Tennessee, for what was done when the epidemics were there raging. But the time has gone by when this board was needed.

I could show to this House, if I only had time and the facts before me, that the men connected with this Board of Health draw their salaries, and the chairman of the board comes only to draw his salary, a very eminent man who knows very little about the details, while a few persons run it in the interest of everything else but the suppression of disease. I know what I say when I say to this House that the money we vote is thrown away, and in the judgment of the best doctors and the best scientists of this country there is no need of this board to indorse your vaccinating matter or otherwise interfere with the medical interests of the people. If we do not succeed in keeping this proviso as it is, I would rather cut out the whole paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I only want to say a word about this matter. I believe in the power and the duty of the Federal Government to obstruct disease so far as it relates to its entering into our borders. It is only a question as to how it is best to be done, how it shall be most economically and thoroughly done. I believe also in the States and the great cities of the country acting in this matter as they have power to do, under police powers. I know the men that constitute the State board in my own State of Illinois, and I have great confidence in them; and I have no doubt the State will continue their power and make appropriation to protect our people as far as possible against the ravages of disease. So it is in many other States.

Gentlemen must not forget that in this new rapidly developing country of ours many schemes, some worthy and some unworthy, seek to fasten themselves upon the Treasury for the purpose of drawing out money merely for the sake of salaries, and they do it, too, in the name of health, and in the name of this and that and the other.

After some investigation I am firmly of the opinion that under this appropriation of $100,000 which is given to the President to be used in case of an epidemic, he can employ the Army and Navy surgeons, he can employ the Marine-Hospital force as it is organized throughout the country, and which can be utilized in the twinkling of an eye wherever it is so organized, with tenfold the effectiveness that this clumsy though respectably named National Board of Health is used or can be used. And I want to say, without abusing any member of that board, that in my opinion, after some investigation, it is the most clumsy, inefficient board that I know of, and will continue to be so in the very nature of things.

The argument will not control me, and I trust will not control others, that the prospect of some constituent here or there in our respective States or counties getting some appointment in connection with this matter should control us, or ought to. In the very nature of things, when you formed these boards, at once that kind of pressure is organized. I say this without having anybody in my mind that I now reflect upon.

I trust that the bill of the committee will stand with this limitation in it, and I want to say that I should not grieve if some one should move, and the motion should be adopted, to strike out entirely this clause and repeal the law providing for the National Board of Health.

Mr. RYAN. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire but a word or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to remind gentlemen that there are only ten minutes before the committee must rise.

Mr. REAGAN. I can say all I want in that time.

Mr. HISCOCK. We are so near five o'clock that I will suggest to the gentleman that he give way for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. REAGAN. I will do so.

Mr. ATKINS. As the yellow fever prevails only in the southern portion of the country, I think if it is asked by gentlemen from Northern States that small-pox shall be included, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] ought to yield.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The "gentleman from New York"——

Mr. ATKINS. I say this to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who intimated that he hoped some gentleman would make a motion to strike this all out, that it would cost the northern people a great deal of money if they should act as they did before, for they poured out their money like water for the aid of our section of the country when the yellow fever was raging there.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg to assure the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that I do not understand, from what I can hear around me, that there is any desire to strike out this provision.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no feeling on the subject. I have said this in deference to the gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire the gentleman to be deferential to me. [Laughter.] I am opposed to putting in small-pox. I am against the small-pox. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. If the discussion is to be continued——

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KASSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ELECTION-CONTEST EXPENSES—GEORGE W. JULIAN.

Mr. PEELLE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of George W. Julian, reported the same back, with the following resolution; and the report was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to insert in the sundry civil or deficiency appropriation bill the sum of $4,000, to be paid to George W. Julian in full of his expenses in the contested-election case of John S. Reed against George W. Julian to a seat in the Forty-first Congress.

FRENCH CABLE COMPANY.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to submit for reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs a resolution of inquiry, and to have printed in the RECORD a communication I have received from the board of trade and transportation of New York City, on the subject of the French Cable Company.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The communication is as follows:

NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York, June 20, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose resolutions (A) relating to ocean-cable rates, which, with the other inclosures, (B, C, and D,) in a measure explain themselves.

We would ask your good offices as a representative of our commercial city in ascertaining the facts officially, and then see what measures can be taken to enforce compliance on the part of the French company with the terms of the agreement they made with our Department of State, February 9, 1880, that it would "not consolidate or amalgamate with any other line or combine therewith for the purpose of regulating rates." (See B.)

For your information I would state that previous to June 1, 1880, the rates were 75 cents per word.

Commencing June 1, 1880, they were made 12½ cents per word.
Commencing October 1, 1880, they were made 50 cents per word.
Commencing August 1, 1881, they were made 25 cents per word.
Commencing May 22, 1882, they were made 50 cents per word.

Very truly, yours,

DARWIN R. JAMES, Secretary.

Hon. S. S. COX.

(A.)

Unanimously adopted at a regular monthly meeting of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, June 14, 1882:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to co-operate with other commercial organizations in the matter of cable rates with a view of procuring action by Congress which will oblige the French Cable Company to comply with the stipulation which it made with our Government at the time it was permitted to land on our shores, to the effect that it would never combine with other companies to raise rates.

The resolution which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs is as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public service, be requested to communicate to this House any information in the possession of the Department of State in reference to any change or modification of the stipulations which the French Cable Company made with our Government on the 9th of February, 1880, when said company was permitted to land its cable upon our shores, to the effect that it would never combine with other companies to raise rates; and further to report the nature of such change or modification, if any, with a view to Congressional action to prevent a consolidation of rates.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN IOWA.

Mr. McCOID. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 4166) to divide the State of Iowa into two judicial districts be taken from the Speaker's table, that the House insist on its non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

BATON ROUGE MILITARY BARRACKS, ETC.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution No 226, and that it be now considered.

The title of the joint resolution was read, as follows:

A joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to lease to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College the grounds of the Baton Rouge military barracks and arsenal.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is consideration of this resolution asked at the present time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The use of this Government property at Baton Rouge has been discontinued for arsenal purposes since 1868, and for garrison purposes since 1879. The property is going to wreck. The Secretary of War has recommended that it be disposed of, either by sale or lease. The Senate passed a resolution authorizing the lease of the property to the blind asylum. This is a substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS BY SEA.

Mr. DEUSTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6722) to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INSPECTION OF WOOD.

Mr. GARRISON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6723) to repeal all laws which require the inspection and measurement of wood brought to the city of Washington for sale; which was read a first and second time, placed on the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FENNIMORE BENNETT.

Mr. McCOOK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 3190) to remove the charge of desertion against Fennimore Bennett; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DUTIES ON SUGAR.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6724) to repeal certain additional duties on sugar, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

OREGON SHORT-LINE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. AINSLIE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 972) creating the Oregon Short-Line Railway Company a corporation in the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Wyoming, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. It will be impossible to consider that bill before the arrival of the hour for the recess.

Mr. AINSLIE. It is a bill of only six or seven lines.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the House cannot commence its consideration now.

ADDISON M. COPEN.

Mr. BARBOUR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6725) for the relief of Addison M. Copen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MORRIS HILB.

Mr. NEAL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6726) for the relief of Morris Hilb; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM E. PRINCE.

Mr. KETCHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6727) granting a pension to William E. Prince; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCOID. There is a resolution for the donation of condemned cannon, which the Committee on Military Affairs has examined, and I would like——

The SPEAKER. That cannot be taken up for consideration now.

THOMAS M'CLAIN.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 3737) granting a pension to Thomas McClain; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZA ATKINS MERCHANT.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 6638) granting a pension to Eliza Atkins Merchant; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF MAJOR D. C. SMITH.

Mr. BRIGGS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 5740) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FIELDING HURST.

Mr. BRIGGS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 4111) for the relief of Fielding Hurst; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. HUMPHREY, indefinitely, on account of important business; and

To Mr. WHITTHORNE, until the 11th instant.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SPAULDING, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print some remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 6682) to fix the salary of the collector of customs of the district of Chicago. [See Appendix.]

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of the Speaker this evening, Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, will preside.

The hour of five o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House, under its previous order, took a recess until eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, as Speaker pro tempore, at eight o'clock p. m. called the House to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order of the House under which the session is held this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until the further order of the House, on Friday of each week the House shall take a recess at four o'clock and thirty minutes until seven o'clock and thirty minutes, at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions only shall be considered. April 14, 1882.—Amended on motion of Mr. JOYCE, so as to include the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon, not to interfere with bills above named: Provided, That general debate shall be in order at such sessions, not to interfere with said bills. June 9, 1882.—Modified so that the recess shall be from five o'clock to eight o'clock p. m., and that the Invalid Pensions and Pensions Committees be authorized to report bills for consideration, and to call up House invalid-pension and pension bills with Senate amendments on Speaker's table for consideration.

MARY E. TAYLOR.

Mr. BROWNE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3733) granting a pension to Mary E. Taylor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARTHA A. JONES.

Mr. BROWNE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3601) for the relief of Martha A. Jones, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Martha A. Jones, widow of the late Oliver P. Jones, who was killed on the "Morgan raid" during the late war, and pay her a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month from the date of her said husband's death.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask by unanimous consent that this bill be considered at this time. I can state in a minute what the case is. In 1863, when John Morgan made his raid into Indiana, the Indiana Legion was called into the field by the proclamation of the governor. It was sworn regularly into the service and was subsequently paid on the pay-roll of the United States. Jones, the husband of the beneficiary of this bill, was a private in one of the companies of that legion. At the city of Lawrenceburgh, on the night of July 14, when it was reported Morgan was approaching the city, the regiment to which Jones belonged was sent to reconnoitre. Some of the companies of the regiment got separated from him and the two parts of the regiment coming together in the night-time began to fire into each other, each supposing the other was a part of Morgan's force, and in that firing Jones was killed. The beneficiary is his surviving widow. If the application had been made before the statute of limitations had expired, she could have had her pension under the pension laws of the United States. I know the facts personally and it is in the line of a number of precedents which have passed the Senate and the House without challenge.

Mr. ALDRICH. Has this been before the Pension Office?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. And rejected?

Mr. BROWNE. It was rejected.

Mr. ALDRICH. On what ground?

Mr. BROWNE. That the soldier was in the State militia and not in the regular volunteer service of the United States.

I now ask that the amendment of the committee be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "from the date of her husband's death."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

HANNAH E. ALDEN.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 6218) granting a pension to Hannah E. Alden; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANTHONY B. GRAVES.

Mr. MATSON also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4387) granting a pension to Anthony B. Graves; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MATSON also, from the same committee, reported back with an adverse recommendation the petition of Samuel T. Henley of the Missouri State militia, and the bill (H. R. No. 1459) granting a pension to Ferdinand Duchanois; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A PETITION.

Mr. MATSON also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Henry Palmer Robinson, a soldier of the Seminole war, with the recommendation that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The recommendation was agreed to.

LAFAYETTE AXTELL.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3714) to increase the pension of Lafayette Axtell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BARBARA MARQUARDT.

Mr. WADSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4357) granting a pension to Barbara Marquardt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROWLAND WARD.

Mr. WADSWORTH also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6728) granting an increase of pension to Rowland Ward; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ESTHER M. CAREY.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Esther M. Carey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS F. BAKER.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1874) granting a pension to Thomas F. Baker; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROBERT CARY.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 4367) granting an increase of pension to Robert Cary; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN HAZLEWOOD.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3047) granting a pension to John Hazlewood; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LANDON B. GRIMES.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5959) reissuing the pension of Landon B. Grimes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH J. CAMERON.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3414) granting a pension to Sarah J. Cameron; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THEODORE RAUTHE.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 1040) granting a pension to Theodore Rauthe; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY J. HANNAFORD.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5849) granting a pension to Mary J. Hannaford, with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES BENNETT.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 6317) granting an increase of pension to James Bennett, with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LINCOLN POST 29, G. A. R.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 1942) granting condemned cannon to Abe Lincoln Post No. 29 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, for monumental purposes, and ask that the same have present consideration.

Mr. BROWNE. It is possible that the order under which the House meets to-night may be broad enough to cover that bill. If so, I have no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend by striking out the word "four" where it occurs in the bill and inserting the word "two."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is in very great doubt whether at this evening's session we have the authority to go to the Speaker's table. The order provides—

That until the further order of the House, on Friday of each week the House shall take a recess at 4.30 o'clock until 7.30 o'clock, at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions only shall be considered. April 14, 1882, amended, on motion of Mr. JOYCE, so as to include the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon, not to interfere with bills above named.

Now, the Chair is of opinion a fair construction of that order would only make it include such bills granting condemned cannon as are reported from a committee of the House, and would not allow the House to go to the Speaker's table to take up Senate bills.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would not that be a somewhat strange construction? The language of the order is much broader than is intimated by the Chair. It includes "the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. While that is true, the Chair thinks the amendment as to bills granting condemned cannon should be considered in connection with the previous order. The previous order restricted the consideration to bills reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions. That was amended so as to include also bills granting condemned cannon; and the Chair thinks that would refer to bills reported from the proper committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. If that had been the intention, would not the order have said so?

Mr. DAWES. The order specifies bills reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions. The bills granting condemned cannon could not be reported from those committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, of course, is willing to submit the matter to the House. But we should keep strictly within the order. And it will be observed that the order was further modified as follows:

June 9, 1882.—Modified so that the recess shall be from five o'clock to eight o'clock p. m., and that the Invalid Pensions and Pensions Committees be authorized to report bills for consideration, and to call up House invalid-pension and pension bills with Senate amendments on Speaker's table for consideration.

That order was made to allow the consideration of those cases on the Speaker's table, and does not include Senate bills on the Speaker's table granting condemned cannon.

Mr. BROWNE. To get out of this difficulty I make the point that the former part of the order provides—

That the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon is not to interfere with the bills reported by the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I hope the Chair will not make a distinct ruling on that subject until the proper time arrives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is disposed to decide at present that the order is not broad enough to allow the House to go to the Speaker's table to take up Senate bills for consideration.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. CULLEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 5064) granting a pension to Temperance J. O'Neal;

A bill (H. R. No. 2235) for the relief of James Buchanan; and

A bill (H. R. No. 195) granting a pension to Robert Cook.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. BRIGGS in the chair.

Mr. PRESCOTT. As we have done on former evenings to avoid loss of time, I move that we informally pass over the following bills, which have been heretofore passed over but still remain on the Calendar:

On page 27, the bill (H. R. No. 2142) granting arrearages of pension to Andrew J. Morrison;

On page 29, the bill (H. R. No. 1218) for the relief of the widows of John R. Gale, &c.;

On page 34, the bill (H. R. No. 1976) granting a pension to the minor children of Aaron Sheridan, deceased;

On page 34, the bill (H. R. No. 1736) granting a pension to Horace S. Spear;

On page 37, the bill (H. R. No. 2328) granting a pension to Joseph R. Benjamin;

On page 40, the bill (H. R. No. 1027) granting a pension to Agnes Fairly;

On page 42, the bill (H. R. No. 1530) granting a pension, &c., to Sylvester F. Hildebrand;

On page 43, the bill (H. R. No. 2812) granting a pension to James King;

On page 44, the bill (H. R. No. 291) granting a pension to William Boone; and

On page 44, the bill (H. R. No. 5505) granting an increase of pension to John O. O'Neill.

That will make the consideration of the Calendar commence to-night with Senate bill No. 718, on page 44.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bills indicated by the gentleman from New York will be passed over.

There was no objection.

ELLEN M. GODFREY.

The CHAIRMAN. The first pension bill on the Calendar to be considered under the order just made is the bill (S. No. 718) granting a pension to Ellen M. Godfrey.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of Ellen M. Godfrey, widow of James A Godfrey, late captain of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, subsequently of the First Maine Heavy Artillery.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 718, granting a pension to Ellen M. Godfrey, widow of Captain James A. Godfrey, Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, subsequently of the First Maine Artillery, having examined all the papers in the case, find the report of the Senate Pension Committee of this Congress fully sustained by the evidence, and we adopt the same as the report of this committee; said report is as follows, namely:

"That in the Forty-sixth Congress a similar bill was considered by the Senate Committee on Pensions and favorably reported to the Senate, as follows:

"'Ellen M. Godfrey is the widow of James A. Godfrey, deceased, late captain of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, subsequently First Maine Heavy Artillery, who enlisted August 4, 1862, was discharged September 11, 1865, and died March 3, 1878. Captain Godfrey applied for a pension in 1872, alleging wound in hand and disability from disease. A pension was granted for the wound only. The widow now applies for a pension, alleging that her husband died of disease contracted in service in the line of duty, and the Pension Bureau rejected her application on the ground that it was not satisfactorily shown that the disease of which her husband died (pulmonary consumption) was contracted in the service in the line of duty.

"'A careful examination of the somewhat voluminous testimony satisfies the committee that at the time of his enlistment Captain Godfrey was a sound and healthy man; that while in the service he contracted a severe cold and sickness from great exposure, in consequence of which he was treated in hospital for several weeks, when he was discharged from hospital and returned to duty, but was unable to perform full duty during the balance of his term of service. At the time of his discharge his health was broken; he was weak, emaciated, and diseased continuously up to the time of his death, continuously under medical treatment, and unable to perform manual labor. It may be that pulmonary consumption did not exist at the time of his discharge, but the committee are fully satisfied that the causes which resulted in that disease and Captain Godfrey's death arose from hardship and exposure in the service and in the line of duty, the effects of which resulted in his death.'

"The committee recommend that the bill be passed."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM HAZELIT.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1195) granting a pension to William Hazelit.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Hazelit, late a private in Company A, Twelfth Regiment Kansas Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1195, granting a pension to William Hazelit, private Company A, Twelfth Regiment Kansas Volunteers, have carefully examined the evidence in the case, and are satisfied that the matter has been well considered by the Senate Pensions Committee of the present Congress. Therefore we adopt their report, which is as follows:

"That during the session of the Forty-sixth Congress the Senate Committee on Pensions, having considered the application of William Hazelit to be granted a pension by special act, reported—

"'That said Hazelit enlisted October 24, 1863, and was discharged for consumption April 13, 1865. His application for a pension, filed September 27, 1875, was rejected June 13, 1879, upon the ground that consumption existed prior to enlistment. This action was based on the surgeon's certificate of disability, in which the surgeon says: "The disease was contracted before enlistment, according to the soldier's statement, to the best of my knowledge."

"'The evidence shows that the claimant is now and since his discharge has been thoroughly disabled. The sole ground of rejection is the opinion of the surgeon who gave a certificate of disability. This opinion, it will be observed, is based not on any personal knowledge of the claimant's condition at the time of his enlistment, but upon the statement of the claimant, and is given with the qualification that it is 'to his best knowledge.' What statements of the claimant induced the surgeon to think the disease existed at the time of enlistment does not appear, and therefore the committee are unable to say how much importance should be attached to the surgeon's opinion.

"'In this case it seems to the committee that the presumption in favor of the claimant's soundness at the time of enlistment, arising from the fact that he was examined and accepted as a sound man, is not overthrown by the qualified opinion of the surgeon, and they therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.'

"Your committee, having made a careful re-examination of the case, unhesitatingly adopt that report as their own."

And we recommend that the Senate bill for the relief of said Hazelit be passed by the House.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JULIA A. STIMERS.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4562) for the relief of Julia A. Stimers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia A. Stimers, widow of Alban C. Stimers, late a chief engineer in the United States Navy.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4562) for the relief of Julia A. Stimers, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to make the following report:

The applicant in this case is Julia A. Stimers, who is the widow of Alban C. Stimers, late a chief engineer in the United States Navy. The said Alban C. Stimers entered the Navy January 11, 1849, and through promotions became chief engineer July 21, 1858, remaining in the service until August 3, 1866. His services were remarkably brilliant and meritorious. In November, 1861, he took the superintendence of the construction of the iron-clad vessel Monitor, and superintended her building and completion, accompanying her as a volunteer to Hampton Roads. On the morning of March 9, 1862, as volunteer engineer under Admiral Worden, he took an active and important part in the famous battle between the Monitor and the Merrimac. Soon afterward he was appointed general inspector of all the iron-clads built by the United States. After the completion of the iron-clads he proceeded to Charleston Harbor to watch and report upon them, and keep them ready for battle. On the 7th of April, 1863, he participated in the attack by the iron-clads upon the forts in Charleston Harbor, and on January 13, 1865, participated in the battle which resulted in the capture of Fort Fisher.

At the close of the war he left the service and became a naval engineer in the city of New York. On June 3, 1876, he did suddenly, leaving his family, consisting of said widow and five children, all of whom were girls, and one of whom was an infant, wholly unprovided for, and the family is now wholly without means of support.

The petition for a pension in behalf of this widow is signed by Admiral Worden, by Chief Engineer Isaac Newton, who was the chief engineer of the Monitor during the action with the Merrimac, and by many others. Said Newton, in a letter dated February 10, 1882, says:

"I deem it my duty to state, without reserve, that it is my opinion, without the skill and courage displayed by Mr. Stimers in the handling of the turret of the Monitor during the combat with the Merrimac, the result of the action would not have been favorable to the Union. The importance of the service he rendered his country on that occasion cannot be overestimated."

Admiral Parks, in a letter dated October 25, 1877, expresses himself strongly in favor of granting a pension to the petitioner.

Hon. Erastus Brooks, of New York, says:

"What is said in the petition of Mrs. Stimers is true. The family board next door to me, upon Staten Island, and I am familiar with the need of the family."

Hon. Gideon Welles, former Secretary of the Navy, says:

"I can frankly and truly say that no one who served on the Monitor in her perilous passage to Hampton Roads and in her world-renowned fight with the Merrimac rendered more valuable and heroic service than Alban C. Stimers."

Your committee are of the opinion that it is just and wise to recognize heroic services of the nature of those performed by Alban C. Stimers; and considering these services and the poverty of the family he left, recommend the passage of the bill granting a gratuity pension to Julia A. Stimers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ABRAM COLLEY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2504) to increase the pension of Abram Colley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Abram Colley, formerly of Company H, Sixth Regiment United States Colored Troops, to $31.25 per month from the date of this act.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendment:

Strike out "$31.25" and insert "$24."

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2504) to increase the pension of Abram Colley, has had the same under consideration and begs leave to submit the following report:

Abram Colley enlisted September 7, 1863, in Company H, Sixth Regiment United States Colored Troops, and was discharged July 18, 1865, on surgeon's certificate, because of gunshot, comminuting tibia and fibula of right leg, and implicating knee-joint, received in battle at Dutch Gap, Virginia, August 17, 1864.

For this injury Colley was pensioned at $8 per month, which rate was subsequently increased to $15 and $18, from June 6, 1866, and June 4, 1872, respectively. He applied for increase on account of another disability, resulting from a wound of hip, alleged to have been received at the same time and place. For this disability the examining surgeon of the Pension Office makes a rating of $6. But inasmuch as the combined disabilities do not disqualify the pensioner for the performance of any manual labor, no increase can be granted by the Pension Office.

Although there is no record evidence of the wound of the hip, its receipt is shown by the testimony of two comrades.

The disabilities are described as follows, in the last medical certificate in the case, dated September 20, 1879: there is a scar three inches below inner tuberosity of right tibia over edge of tibia, marking entrance of ball, another just below tubercle of tibia, another over upper extremity of fibula, and two or three in a line below the latter. The injury has resulted in anchylosis of the knee-joint (the leg slightly bent upon the thigh) with anchylosis of the ankle. As there is no work for the muscles, they are atrophied down thigh and leg. There is also a scar over the great trochanter of right thigh. The gluteal muscles are affected by this, but more especially the muscles of the loins. The first described disability alone is equivalent to the loss of the leg above the knee. The condition of the whole limb, with the difficulty of locomotion, is affecting his general health.

In the judgment of this committee the absence in the general pension laws of any provision for the rating of a disability equivalent to the loss of a leg above the knee should not deprive a person of the rate provided for the latter disability, if suffering from one equivalent thereto, and therefore recommends that the words "thirty-one dollars and twenty-five cents," in lines 6 and 7 of the bill, be stricken out, and the words "twenty-four dollars" be inserted instead, and asks that the bill thus amended do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

D. F. BASHARES.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5725) to grant a pension to D. F. Bashares.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of D. F. Bashares, late of Company F, Eighth Regiment Maryland Volunteers, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws of the United States.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5725) to grant a pension to D. F. Bashares, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

Daniel F. Bashares enlisted as a private in Company F, Eighth Maryland Volunteers, August 19, 1862, and was discharged May 31, 1865. On the 12th day of April, 1879, he filed in the Pension Office an application for pension on account of lung and heart disease, alleged to have been caused by fever and ague contracted in November, 1862, while on duty near Williamsport, Maryland.

This claim has been rejected because there is no record of the alleged diseases, and the claimant is unable to comply with the requirements of the Pension Office to furnish medical evidence showing the existence of said disease in service or at date of discharge.

In support of his claim he has filed numerous affidavits of neighbors, officers, and fellow-soldiers, setting forth that he was a sound man prior to and at the time of his enlistment. Lieutenant Grass and comrades Simon Johnston and Peter Ring testify that the soldier, while in line of duty, in the winter of 1862–'63, was taken sick with rheumatism, became broken down in health, and was sent to hospital; also suffered from fever and ague brought on by exposure, and that thereafter the soldier was never really fit for full duty. The same parties also testify that they have seen him a number of times in each year since his discharge, and that since that time he has been unfit to perform hard manual labor. The affiants have worked with him several times, and he would give out in a short time after attempting to do hard labor.

The claimant makes oath that he was not treated by any regular physician for three or four years after discharge, but took a great deal of patent medicine, until his case became serious, when he employed a physician. Drs. Healy and Fundenburg testify that they have treated the claimant more or less since 1869 for an affection of the heart and asthma, which disabled him to a very large extent from performing any manual labor. In the opinion of affiants the diseases are chargeable to exposure in the service. He is now a confirmed invalid, with no prospect of restoration to health. Has imperfect action of the heart, and cough. A number of neighbors also testify to the claimant's soundness prior to his enlistment, and to his continuous inability since discharge to perform hard manual labor, because of disease, which, in their opinion, must have been contracted during his military service.

It further appears that the claimant called upon his late regimental surgeon for an affidavit as to treatment while in service, but the surgeon having no record of his treatment as said surgeon, and having no personal recollection of the claimant, declined to furnish the affidavit required by the Pension Office. The medical examination had of claimant under the instructions of the Pension Office show disability by reason of hypertrophy of heart and bronchial irritation, and generally impaired health.

In the opinion of this committee there is ample proof that claimant was a sound and healthy man when he enlisted; that from exposure he contracted diseases which have disabled him ever since his discharge. The absence of record of treatment is no fault of the soldier; neither should his failure to employ medical attendance immediately after discharge prejudice his right to a pension.

Taking into consideration all the facts shown in the case, the committee are inclined to grant the relief asked for, and therefore report favorably on the bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE. The next bills are some reported from the Committee on Pensions. I desire to inquire if there are any gentlemen present representing that committee?

Mr. STONE. I represent that committee.

Mr. STEELE. So do I.

ORPAH MEACHAM.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6400) granting a pension to Mrs. Orpah Meacham.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Orpah Meacham, widow of the late Colonal Alfred B. Meacham, and to pay her, from and after the passage of this act, during her widowhood, the sum of $50 a month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

REBECCA WRIGHT.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of Rebecca Wright, widow of James Wright, a soldier of the war of 1812.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to put the name of Rebecca Wright, widow of James Wright, who was a private in Captain Bosier's company, war of 1812, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SUSAN SHEARER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 3322) for the relief of Susan Shearer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be placed on the pension-roll the name of Susan Shearer, widow of Daniel Shearer, late a member of Captain Shower's company of Maryland militia in the war of 1812, at the rate of $8 per month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

GEORGE C. QUICK.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 1532) granting a pension to George C. Quick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George C. Quick, who served in Captain Solomon Miller's company of Mounted Rangers in the Black Hawk war.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SUSAN BAYARD.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5558) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Bayard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Susan Bayard, widow of Anthony W. Bayard, a soldier of the war of 1812.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

AARON BUCHANAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5763) granting a pension to Aaron Buchanan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Aaron Buchanan, late a private in Company C, Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. BROWNE. I notice that that bill is reported adversely from the committee. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5773) granting a pension to Aaron Buchanan, being informed that the pension asked for has been granted under the general pension laws, begs leave to return the same with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

Mr. BROWNE. I think that had better be done.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

CATHARINE STOVER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6411) granting a pension to Catharine Stover.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Catharine Stover, widow of Joseph W. Stover, late a soldier in the Fifth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry, commanded by Colonel D. R. Haggard, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to so correct the records of the War Department as to free said Joseph W. Stover from the charge of desertion.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CYNTHIA MARTIN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6412) granting a pension to Cynthia Martin, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Cynthia Martin, widow of the late Robert H. Martin, a soldier in Company H, Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, commanded by Colonel D. Haggard, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to so correct the records of the War Department as to free said Robert H. Martin from the charge of desertion.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ALICE J. BENNIT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of Alice J. Bennit.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alice J. Bennit, widow of Charles N. Bennit, late a private in Company H of the Eighty-fourth Regiment of New York Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month, and $2 dollars per month in addition thereto for each child of said Charles N. and Alice J. Bennit until they arrive at the age of 16 years respectively.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let us have the report in that case read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of Alice J. Bennit, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to make the following report:

It appears from the evidence in this case that the petition has heretofore been under the consideration of a committee of this House, and a report was made to the Forth-sixth Congress by the Hon. Mr. Mason, of the then Committee on Invalid Pensions. The following is the substance of that report:

"It appears from the evidence in the case on file in the Pension Office that the petitioner is the widow of Charles N. Bennit, late private Company H, Fourteenth New York State Militia, who was a pensioner upon the rolls 'for loss of leg below the knee, the result of wound received at the battle of Bull Run, August 29, 1862. He was pensioned at $8 per month from date of discharge, October 8, 1862, and paid at that rate till March 3, 1865, when, under the provisions of the act of that date, his pension was suspended by reason of his employment in the civil service of the Government. Under the provisions of the act of June 6, 1866, payment of pension was resumed, and the rate thereof increased to $15 per month. A further increase to $18 per month was allowed under the act of June 8, 1872. The amount withheld between March 3, 1865, and June 6, 1866, was paid to the widow May 16, 1879.'"

The following certificates of the attending physicians show time and cause of death of the soldier:

This is to certify that I was one of the attending physicians on Charles N. Bennit during his last illness. He was taken with a convulsion about 7 p. m., November 25, and died November 26, at 2 p. m. His disease was congestion of the brain, with probably a rupture of one of the cerebral arteries. In my opinion the cause of his death was indirectly related to the loss of his leg during the war. My reasons are briefly as follows, namely: in any person losing a limb just as much of the area of the circulation of the blood is cut off, and so a greater pressure is brought to bear on the remaining vessels. Again, there is a great amount of vital force expended by anybody who is obliged to carry around eight or ten pounds of wooden leg. This is an ever-increasing burden, and will in time gradually undermine the party's health. Thus, in Charles N. Bennit's case, with a debilitated system and an increased blood pressure, nothing more likely than his death by congestion of the brain.

WILL. W. BENNIT, M. D.,
26 Bond Street, Brooklyn, New York.

APRIL 28, 1880.

BLADENSBURGH, PRINCE GEORGE'S COUNTY, MARYLAND,
September 30, 1879.

The undersigned was called hurriedly on the night of November 25, 1878, to see Mr. Charles N. Bennit, in consultation with his brother, Dr. William Bennit. The history of the case, as gathered from the attending physician, was that the patient had been ailing for some time with intermittent fever, and that he had shown symptoms of fever for several days previous to my visit. I was told that he had complained for some time past of occasional attacks of violent headache. The amputated limb was excessively wasted. I found the patient completely comatose, having just gotten over a strong convulsion. I diagnosed "cerebritis" developed from "malarial fever." The patient never recovered consciousness; had frequent slight convulsive movements during the entire night, dying next day, November 26, 1878, at about two o'clock, p. m.

CHARLES A. WELLS, M. D.

By affidavits recently filed with this committee it appears that the deceased soldier was habitually in excellent health until during his service in the Army. He enlisted when nineteen years of age, in October, 1861; was sick from malarial fever in the summer of 1862; was wounded August 29, 1862, and his leg was amputated in consequence thereof. He seemed never to recover from the effect of this wounding and consequent sickness. His wound was received while fighting at the front, and he was taken prisoner, remaining as such for some time.

From 1865 until the death of the soldier he was subject to periodical attacks of headache, which in the spring and fall assumed a very violent character, and seemed to grow worse from year to year. About three weeks before his death he had one of these attacks, which was very violent. He suffered also greatly from his amputated limb, especially during the summer, eruptions appearing on the stump, sometimes as many as five at a time, causing much weakness and pain. His maimed limb became much shrunken, and he lacked strength to wear his wooden leg without great exertion. The troubles constituting his disability appear to have continued from the amputation of his limb until his death, and it is reasonable to infer that his death was the result of disabilities incurred in the line of duty. It also appears that the petitioner, a widow, has three children—one born in 1871, one in 1867, and one in 1877—all of whom are now living, the children of said deceased soldier.

It further appears that the widow has but a small income, merely sufficient to provide clothing for the said children, and she is without other means of support.

The committee are of the opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, justice requires that the petitioner should receive a pension, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

FLORIDA G. CASEY.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Florida G. Casey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Florida G. Casey, widow of General Silas Casey, deceased, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARGARET G. HALPINE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5312) granting a pension to Margaret G. Halpine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret G. Halpine, widow of Charles G. Halpine, late a lieutenant-colonel and brevet brigadier-general of volunteers in the Union Army, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LYDIA S. ROARK.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 1576) granting a pension and bounty to Lydia S. Roark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Lydia S. Roark, minor child of Alvin Roark, late a private in Company B, Second Regiment of Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, on the roll of pensioners, and pay to her, if she is of lawful age, but if not, to her legally-appointed guardian, out of the military pension fund, a pension of $8 per month commencing on the 6th day of November, 1863, with increase of $2 per month commencing on the 25th day of July, 1866, to continue up to the time she arrived at sixteen years of age.

SEC. 2. That the Paymaster-General of the United States Army be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money appropriated, or hereafter to be appropriated, for the payment of the Army, to Lydia S. Roark, minor child of Alvin Roark, late a private in Company B, Second Regiment of Tennessee Volunteers, if she is of lawful age, but if not, to her legally appointed guardian, $192, for twelve months' service of said soldier in said regiment, together with the regular bounty due said soldier, and also the additional bounty under act of July 28, 1866.

Mr. BROWNE. I think that bill has been very essentially and materially amended some way or other, in the report if not in the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that no copy of the report is here.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then let the bill be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HENRY S. WOODWARD.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6422) granting a pension to Henry S. Woodward.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry S. Woodward, late a private in Company E of the First Regiment United States Veteran Engineers, on account of injuries received in said service.

Mr. McMILLIN. Read the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred by the Commissioner of Pensions the case of Henry S. Woodward, late a private of Company E, First United States Veteran Volunteer Engineers, for its consideration under the joint resolution of Congress, approved May 29, 1830, entitled "A resolution requiring annual reports to be made to Congress in relation to applications for pension," has carefully examined all the evidence presented in support of the claim, and begs to submit the following report:

Henry S. Woodward enlisted in Company F, Second Ohio Volunteers, September 1, 1861, and appears to have been in active service, in that organization, to December 31, 1862, when he is reported as detailed in Pioneer Corps, and so reported to August 31, 1864, when he was assigned to the First Regiment Veteran Engineers. It further appears that he was enrolled as veteran volunteer, August 29, 1864, in Company E, First Regiment United States Veteran Engineers, to serve three years, and was, on September 12, 1864, with twenty-one others of said company, granted a veteran furlough for the period of thirty-six days. At the expiration of his furlough, Woodward started for his command, and while en route was injured by having his right foot caught between the bumpers of the cars upon which he was riding. The foot was amputated at the ankle joint. The evidence shows that the injury was not due to the carelessness or neglect of the claimant, but to a sudden jerk of the train while backing up on the track at Murfreesborough, Tennessee, by which he was partly thrown off the platform where he was standing receiving some provisions.

The Commissioner of Pensions states that the claim was rejected February 22, 1877, on the ground that—

"The injury was not incurred in the line of duty, because he was not with any detachment of the organization, nor absent on sick-furlough, and is held, under the construction given to section 4700 of the Revised Statutes, as his own free agent while on individual veteran-furlough, until the time he rejoined his command."

* * * * * * * *

"The applicant, however, appears to have been present during the entire period of his service, except when on the furlough before mentioned, and is entitled to some consideration on account of his crippled condition, which would not have occurred had he not been in the service."

Section 4700 Revised Statutes, referred to by the Commissioner of Pensions, is as follows:

"Officers absent on sick-leave, and enlisted men absent on sick-furlough or on veteran-furlough with the organization to which they belong, shall be regarded in the administration of the pension laws in the same manner as if they were in the field or hospital."

The construction given this section by the Pension Office would exclude from its benefits, in case of injury, every person who, because of enlistment subsequent to the organization of the command, could not avail himself of his veteran-furlough at the time "the organization to which he belonged" was entitled to said furlough. Only twenty-one of the company were thus furloughed with the claimant. They were not with "the organization" to which they belonged, nor even a detachment of the same, unless under the command of an officer, which is not shown in this case.

To discriminate between the person injured without any fault of his, while on veteran furlough with his command, and the person who was injured in like manner while in the enjoyment of his veteran furlough at a time other than that set aside for the greater part of the command, would do an injustice to the latter, which in the opinion of this committee could not have been the intention of Congress in the framing of the section above quoted.

The committee fully concurs in the opinion expressed by the Commissioner of Pensions, that the claimant is entitled to some consideration on account of his crippled condition, and therefore submits the accompanying bill and asks that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES H. M'NUTT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 2285) to increase the pension of James H. McNutt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of James H. McNutt, late assistant surgeon of the Ninety-seventh Regiment Indiana Infantry State Volunteers, to $20 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 2285, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

James H. McNutt was assistant surgeon of the Ninety-seventh Indiana Volunteers, and as such served out his full term of three years. He is now seventy-seven years old, and is pensioned at the rate of $12.75 per month on account of chronic diarrhea. In 1878 he was afflicted with other diseases, which he proves by medical testimony were the result of his chronic diarrhea, which then, and have ever since, to a considerable extent, increased his disability. His only son was killed in battle in front of Atlanta while fighting for the Union.

He asks for $25 per month. This committee are of the opinion that he should have $20 per month, and recommend the passage of the bill with this amendment, striking out the word "four" in line 6 of said bill.

The amendment recommended by the committee, to strike out the word "four" in line 6, making the pension $20 per month instead of $24, was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

EMMA A. RAMSEY.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 462) granting a pension to Emma A. Ramsey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emma A. Ramsey, widow of J. Allen Ramsey, late surgeon of the One hundred and twenty-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, to take effect from the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions to whom was referred the bill S. No. 462, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

We adopt the facts set forth in the Senate Committee report on this case, as follows:

"The claimant, Emma A. Ramsey, is the widow of J. Allen Ramsey, late surgeon of One hundred and twenty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers.

"It appears that claimant's husband served in that capacity from the 18th of September, 1862, till mustered out June 2, 1865.

"Claimant applied for pension January 20, 1877, alleging that her said husband died from the effects of disability contracted while in said service, said disability being the result of an affection of the lungs.

"It appears from the evidence on file that claimant's husband died January 10, 1873, of pneumonia, at Philadelphia.

"William P. Hubbell testifies that Surgeon Ramsey was a healthy man at enlistment, and that immediately after discharge from service he was suffering from a severe cough and disease of the bronchia and lungs, which he stated was contracted in the campaign against Richmond in 1864–'65, and which finally caused his death.

"Dr. C. Paul testifies that he was called upon to attend claimant's husband January 1, 1873, and did attend him till his death, January 10, 1873. His disease was asthenia, or inability to withstand the severity of an attack of pneumonia because of a previously impaired physical condition.

"Mary W. Smith testifies to an acquaintance with claimant's husband from 1866 till his death, in 1873, and that during that time he was suffering from a severe cough, which gave him great pain in the chest and interfered with his sleep.

"The claim was rejected because it appeared that claimant's husband died with an acute disease, and, consequently, not contracted in the service."

The conclusion of this committee is that the death of Dr. Ramsey was the result of a disease contracted in the service, and report favorably.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

DANIEL G. GEORGE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 1011) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. George.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel G. George, late a private in Company B, First Massachusetts Cavalry, in the war of the rebellion, at the rate of $24 per month from and after the passage of this act, instead of $8 per month, which he is now receiving.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1011) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. George, Company D, First Regiment Massachusetts Cavalry, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

The petitioner, Daniel G. George, was mustered into Company D, First Regiment Massachusetts Cavalry, as a private on the 17th day of September, 1861, for three years or during the war. He was wounded on the night of the 27th of March, 1862, about twelve or one o'clock, while in the line of duty, going the grand round with his captain, by being thrown from his horse against a tree, fracturing the right thigh, breaking the bone into eight pieces; treated in regimental hospital, transferred to general hospital at Hilton Head, South Carolina, on the 22d day of May, 1862, as Dan. G. George with "fracture," (no other diagnosis.) He returned to duty June 20, 1862, and subsequently engaged in all the battles in which his command took part.

At Aldie, Virginia, he led his company into the cavaly fight on the 17th of June, 1863, with fifty-four men, and lost fifty of them killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. His horse, pierced with seven bullets, fell on his leg, from which George could not escape, and he was taken prisoner, carried to Libby Prison, Richmond, Virginia, where he remained three months, when, being regularly exchanged, he rejoined his command, with which he remained until transferred to the Navy, the 21st day of April, 1864, when he enlisted and was sent to Brooklyn navy-yard, and where a draft was made for the Chicopee, South Atlantic station. One William Smith was drawn, who did not want to go, so Mr. George, who liked the naval service, (having served in the Navy five years previous to the war,) exchanged papers with Smith, and when the roll was called answered to Smith's name, and was known on the Chicopee as William Smith. He was coxswain of Lieutenant Walker's boat.

Lieutenant Walker called for volunteers to blow up the rebel ram Albemarle, in Plymouth Harbor, Pamlico Sound, and George was the first volunteer who responded to the call. The party started for the rebel ram on the night of October 24, 1864, and finally succeeded in getting to her in the darkness of the night. Mr. George and a chum named Haden dropped the torpedo, of one hundred and eighty-six pounds' weight, down under the ram. Cushing gave the order to reverse steam and back over the logs, which they were unable to do. Cushing, finding they could not get her out, cried out: "Pull her off, Dan: we'll all go to hell together!" Dan pulled the lanyard and the torpedo exploded, opening a seam twenty feet long and an inch or more wide, which sank the ram in about two hours.

Those in the lieutenant's boat were blown into the air, and all but Cushing and Haden taken prisoners. George and the crew were surrounded by the infuriated rebels, who would have killed them on the spot had it not been for Captain Cooke, of the Albemarle, who rushed to the spot with revolver in hand, and said he would shoot the first man who attempted to injure them, declaring that he had been thirty years in the United States Navy, and this was the bravest deed he had ever known.

Mr. George was taken to Saulsbury prison, remained there eight or nine months, till the war closed, when he returned to the Chicopee, and was honorably discharged April 26, 1866, having served four years, six months, and sixteen days, during which time he was engaged in twenty-one battles, besides many skirmishes with the enemy.

He filed his application for a pension February 28, 1877, and was pensioned November 17, 1877, from October 1, 1877, at $12 per month, for "fracture of right thigh," arrears allowed from April 27, 1866, to September 30, 1877, at $8 per month. Application for increase filed July 6, 1880, on account of original disability. Dr. James H. Crombie, who was the examining surgeon at the time of his original application, states that in his opinion said Daniel G. George is disabled to the extent or equivalent to the loss of one foot, or one hand. Judging from his then present condition, and from the evidence before him, Dr. Crombie gives the opinion that the disability originated in the service and in the line of duty, and that it is permanent.

Your committee, after a thorough examination of the papers, make a favorable report and unanimously recommend the passage of the bill granting him an increase of pension to $24 per month, from and after the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ADELINE A. TURNER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6521) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline A. Turner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Adeline A. Turner, as dependent mother of Captain Joseph S. Hills, late captain of Company A, Sixteenth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 704) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline A. Turner, submit the following report:

Mrs. Adeline A. Turner, of Boston, Massachusetts, a widow, asks for a pension on account of the death of her adopted son, Captain Joseph S. Hills, of the Sixteenth Massachusetts Volunteers, who was killed at the battle of the Wilderness May 6, 1864. He was enlisted, and was mustered July 12, 1861, for three years. He was promoted from first sergeant to be second lieutenant August 11, 1862; to be first lieutenant November 10, 1862, and to be captain May 6, 1863. Had he lived two months and six days his three years' service would have been completed.

The proof is full and decisive that Mrs. Turner was chiefly dependent upon Captain Hills for her maintenance and support, and he sent her money from time to time while in the Army for that purpose, and Professor Francis L. Hills, of the Maine State College, certifies that Mrs. Turner filled the place of a faithful mother to Captain Hills from his childhood to man's estate, and that even before the war he contributed the greater portion of his earnings for her support.

This case cannot receive favorable action at the Pension Office because the general pension laws do not allow a pension to a dependent mother on account of the death of an adopted son. Mrs. Turner is poor, and in view of the facts above stated we think, in equity and conscience, she is as much entitled to a pension as any natural mother would be. Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill (which we report as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 704) providing that Mrs. Turner's name be placed on the pension-roll as a dependent mother, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HARRIET N. ABBOTT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5906) granting a pension to Harriet N. Abbott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to put upon the pension-roll the name of Harriet N. Abbott, of Moultonville, Carroll County, New Hampshire, widow of Jacob Abbott, late a private in Company K, Ninth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5906) granting a pension to Harriet N. Abbott, having considered the same submit the following report:

The petitioner, Harriet N. Abbott, is the widow of Jacob Abbott, late a private, Company K, Ninth New Hampshire Volunteers. It appears that said Jacob Abbott was duly mustered into service as a private August 15, 1862, at Concord, New Hampshire. He was discharged October 17, 1862, by order of Brigadier-General Brown, for wound received in action at South Mountain, Virginia, September 14, 1862.

The records in the Surgeon-General's Office show that Abbott was treated at No. 5, General Hospital, Frederick, Maryland, September 18 to 20, 1862, for wound of side; in Patent Office Hospital, Washington, District of Columbia, September 21 to 24, 1862, for acute rheumatism; and in hospital at Newark, New Jersey, September 28 to October 27, 1862, for wound of right shoulder. He re-enlisted September 15, 1864, as private, Company K, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery, to serve one year. He served in that organization until he was mustered out with his company June 15, 1865.

During the second service the hospital records show that he was admitted to hospital for fever at Fort Constitution, New Hampshire, December 12, 1864, and returned to duty January 15, 1865. He was pensioned for gunshot wound of right side, but died October 16, 1880, before his claim for increase on account of fever and ague and lung disease was completed.

The ground upon which the widow's petition was rejected by the Pension Office was that he died from softening of the brain, and not from disability contracted in the service.

Surgeon Samuel W. Roberts, of Wakefield, New Hampshire, in his certificate, dated April 20, 1880, states that he carefully examined the said Jacob Abbott, and that, in his belief, the gunshot wound of right side, and the disability resulting from chills and fever, bronchitis, and diarrhea originated in the service and while Abbott was in the line of his duty, and that he was totally incapacitated from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor, and that his death was attributable to the wound and diseases aforesaid.

Dr. Roberts's testimony is also confirmed by other evidence in the case, which your committee do not think it necessary to report in detail.

Dr. G. W. Tebbetts, of Ossipee, New Hampshire, certified, in 1872, that Abbott was sick when he entered the military service of the United States; but afterward, in 1880, the same Dr. Tebbetts made oath that he had known Abbott about twenty years, and had been his family physician for eighteen or nineteen years, and was aware of no disability whatever on the part of said Abbott before or at the time of his enlistment. It is unnecessary for your committee to point out the fact that a sick man probably would not be enlisted or mustered into the military service of the United States.

Judging from the entire history of the case, it seems to us as altogether more probable than otherwise that Abbott's death was caused by wounds and disease received during his army service. We therefore make a favorable report, and recommend that the bill (H. R. No. 5906) granting a pension to Harriet N. Abbott, his widow, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, be passed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JEROME B. ADAMS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6522) granting an increase of pension to Jerome B. Adams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Jerome B. Adams, of Lynn, Massachusetts, late a private in Company B, Fourth Regiment Massachusetts Heavy Artillery Volunteers, from $4 per month to the rate prescribed by law for pensioners of his rank who have become totally blind, said increase to begin when this act is passed.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6522) for additional pension to Jerome B. Adams, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Jerome B. Adams, of Lynn, Massachusetts, a private in Company B, Fourth Regiment of Heavy Artillery, Massachusetts Volunteers, served from August, 1864, until June 17, 1865, when he was honorably discharged. He was granted a pension (certificate No. 170459) at the rate of $4 per month, commencing June 18, 1865, for chronic diarrhea contracted in the service and while in the line of his duty. Said Adams also claimed a pension on the ground of blindness, which was disallowed at the Pension Office because the blindness was not traceable to or caused by the soldier's military service. The applicant claims that as a sequence of the disability for which his pension at the rate of $4 per month was allowed, namely, chronic diarrhea, he has become totally blind and unable to perform any manual labor or to go about at home or abroad without being attended by another person.

The evidence in relation to his blindness is that in 1866 the claimant's eyes began to fail, and to such an extent that in April, 1867, he felt obliged to go to the Boston City Hospital, where they were examined by eminent oculists, and the opinion was expressed by them that the soldier's failing eyesight was "the result of his physical disability, that medicine for his eyes would not do them any good, but that his system was so much run down that he could be relieved by eating beer and other nourishing food." Adams followed this advice for a long time, but without relief. Notwithstanding he consulted the best medical aid obtainable, his eyesight continued to fail until the year 1878, when he became totally blind, in which condition the claimant now is, and he has been totally blind from thence hitherto. Dr. Haskett Derby, one of the best physicians and oculists in Boston, certifies, December 14, 1880, that he—

"This day examined the eyes of Jerome B. Adams; that he has incurable atrophy of each optic nerve and is practically blind. From the history of the case he gives I see no reason to doubt the connection of this affection of vision with exposure undergone and disease contracted while in the Army."

Dr. Edward Newhall, also an eminent authority in the profession, certifies as follows:

"He also is totally and hopelessly blind. In my opinion the trouble of his eyes is the direct constitutional derangement produced by exposure, fatigue, and sickness while in the service of the United States Army."

Dr. Isaac Galloupe, the examining surgeon, October 14, 1879, certifies:

"In my opinion the blindness is due to impoverished condition of blood consequent upon impaired digestion and assimilation of food resulting from diarrhea. Disability from diarrhea is one-half, (½,) from blindness is total. Disability from blindness is permanent. He requires the regular aid and attendance of another person."

F. P. Patten and four other neighbors of said Adams certify that they "have known said Adams since his return from the Army in 1865, and that we know that he has suffered from failing eyesight since he came from the Army until he became totally blind in 1878."

Your committee are not advised upon what ground the Pension Office rejected the applicant's claim for pension on account of blindness, except the record shows "the blindness not admitted as a result." We think from the evidence of the examining surgeon, Dr. Galloupe, supported as it is by the testimony of Drs. Derby and Newhall, and the fact that no other cause is, or can be so far as we are aware, pointed out for the applicant's blindness save chronic diarrhea, with which he was attacked while in the Army, and from which he has suffered ever since, together with the exposure, hardship, and fatigue endured while in the service, that it is altogether more probable than otherwise that his blindness is the result of his Army service, and that an increase of pension as for total blindness should be allowed him from and after the passage of the accompanying bill, which your committee herewith report, recommending its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

N. C. RIDENOUR.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6523) for the relief of N. C. Ridenour.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he hereby is, directed to place the name of N. C. Ridenour, late a second lieutenant of Company F, Twenty-third Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll as such second lieutenant, the Commissioner of Pensions to rate him in accordance with such rank; the increase of pension herein authorized to commence upon the passage of this act and be in lieu of all other pensions.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 310) for the relief of Newton C. Ridenour, second lieutenant Company F, Twenty-third Iowa Volunteer Infantry, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

Newton C. Ridenour, late second lieutenant Company F, Twenty-third Iowa Volunteer Infantry, was granted a pension July 26, 1880, at the rate of $3 per month, the certificate being No. 164,978. Prior to and until June 29, 1863, said Ridenour was serving with his regiment in the field in the campaign against Vicksburgh as an orderly sergeant. On June 29, 1863, was commissioned second lieutenant, for which place he was recommended early in June, said commission being dated June 29, 1863.

About the 5th day of July, 1863, by order of the officer commanding the regiment, said Ridenour took command of Company F, and continued in command until October 5, 1864, when he was assigned to staff duty. Said Ridenour was discharged as an enlisted man as of the date of June 29, 1863, and he was accepted and mustered in as second lieutenant, to take effect July 1, 1863. Immediately after the surrender of Vicksburgh said Ridenour, in charge of said company, in July, 1863, marched from said city to Jackson, Mississippi. During said march said claimant was attacked with varicocele, and was at times rendered thereby unable to march, and was compelled to resort to the ambulance. When he entered the service he was a strong, healthy man. Previously to said month of July, 1863, or in the latter part of June of that year, the petitioner was somewhat unwell, although the precise nature of his ailment is unknown, and he was not then aware that it was the varicocele for which he was afterward pensioned.

It is not certain that said disease had its inception before July, 1863. But if that was the fact, it is apparent and uncontradicted that the principal development, growth, and establishment of the disease occurred after the commencement of the march from Vicksburgh to Jackson. It is shown by medical evidence that the disability of said Ridenour is permanent and incurable, and that such disability incapacitates said Ridenour from performing manual labor.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS WILSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 4092) to increase the pension of Thomas Wilson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of Thomas Wilson, late of Company H, Sixty-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, from $24 per month to $72 per month, the said Wilson having had his eyesight so much impaired by a gunshot wound in the left eye as to make the loss of eyesight practically although not absolutely total.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4092) have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

Thomas E. Wilson is now a pensioner at the rate of $24, on account of injury to eyes received in the military service of the United States, and in the line of duty. His left eye was destroyed by a gunshot wound received in battle. His right eye, on account of the injury to the left, has failed to that extent that the sight of it is practically useless. He can distinguish light and large objects. He has furnished the sworn statement of two oculists and three physicians, based upon recent examinations, and all concur in the fact that he is practically, although not totally, blind. He is now receiving the highest rate of pension allowed for them whose sight have been injured but not totally destroyed. His only relief is by the enactment of a private law. He asks for $50 per month. The committee are of the opinion he should have $30 per month and they recommend that the bill be amended by adding the words, "to take effect from and after the passage of this act;" and then ask that the bill do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee, to add to the bill the words "to take effect from and after the passage of this act," was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE. There appears to be an error in the bill. I move to amend by striking out "72" and inserting "30," so as to make the pension $30 per month, as recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH C. GOLDERMAN.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 603) granting a pension to Sarah C. Golderman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah C. Golderman, widow of Augustus Golderman, late a captain in the Seventeenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 603) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah C. Golderman, widow of Augustus Golderman, late a captain in the Seventeenth Maine Volunteers, ask leave to report the following:

That Augustus Golderman, of Mechanics Falls, Maine, when living, the husband of this claimant, was mustered into service of the United States as captain of Company C, Seventeenth Regiment Maine Volunteers, on the 1st day of August, 1862; received a serious bullet wound in the knee at the battle of Chancellorsville; was discharged from the service for this disability the 19th of August, 1863; was pensioned at the rate of $20 per month, subsequently reduced to $10, and at a later date was restored to $20. He committed suicide the 19th day of November, 1873, leaving a widow, Sarah C. Golderman, and one minor child, Frank A.

It satisfactorily appears that the suicide was the result of insanity; that previous to entering the service the soldier had been a sound man, both in mind and body; that there was no insanity in his family; that he had no habits tending to produce it; that the wound was a serious one, splintering the bones of the knee, some of which were subsequently removed, the bullet remaining in the knee; that the examining surgeon pronounced him one-half disabled.

After receiving a pension of $20 per month for a year or two, on the report of a special agent of the Department and on the declaration of the examining surgeon that the knee was improving, his pension was reduced to $10 per month. It was subsequently found that the surgeon was mistaken, that the knee was growing worse instead of better, and the soldier was restored to his original pension. The attending physician was Dr. Carr, who died before his testimony could be obtained. It is in testimony that the soldier showed signs of insanity in January, 1864; again in 1872, when he made several attempts to take his life; again in 1873, when he succeeded.

John C. Walker, a neighbor of the soldier, and his druggist, testifies that he heard him complain many times of the pain caused by his wound, and that he had no doubt that this intense pain was the cause of his insanity and death.

Asa L. Downs, another neighbor, testifies:

"I know he suffered intense pain from the wound received in the service of the United States. I took care of him two weeks at one time when he suffered severely from said wound, and he told me he was afraid the pain he suffered would make him crazy. I believe his insanity and death were caused by the wound."

His widow's statements are to the same end.

A communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, dated December 17, 1880, says:

"This claim was rejected January 11, 1879, on the ground that the death—cause, suicide by hanging—was not shown to have been the result of the wound for which the soldier was pensioned, or due to any disease which had its origin in the service."

Further:

"The testimony of Downs and Walker, referred to above, said to have been filed within a few months, has not reached the case, and the records of the office fail to exhibit any evidence of its receipt."

Again, January 24, 1881, in a communcation to Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, the Commissioner says:

"It would appear from the history of the claim that it is not susceptible of proof to its establishment under the existing law, and the claimant's prayer for relief by Congress would be the only remedy."

The soldier's enlistment, muster into active service, his severe wound received at the battle of Chancellorsville, his discharge from the service on account of it, his pension, reduction of same, restoration to original amount, intense and continued pain, great anxiety and depression of mind, insanity, and death; that Sarah C. Golderman was lawfully married to him, is the lawful mother of his minor child, has never remarried—in fact, everything to establish the claim is proved by competent testimony, except the one fact that the insanity and death were the direct results of the wound received or disease contracted in the service. By reason of the death of Golderman's attending physician no direct evidence can be produced to meet this inexorable demand of the law.

But it is proven that Dr. Husam, a distinguished physician, late of Portland, Maine, was a captain in same regiment with Golderman, and that he knew this soldier well, and saw him frequently after his return from the Army, and that he said that he "had no doubt of the insanity of Golderman, and no doubt but that the insanity was caused by the wound." Dr. Husam died in Ireland about a year ago, whither he was sent as a delegate to a medical convention. Dr. Gaubert also testifies that his opinion on the case stated agrees with that of Dr. Husam, as above.

Taking the history of the case, and the testimony adduced, your committee are of opinion that both the insanity and death resulted from the wound received in the line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

GEORGE C. RUST.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6524) granting a pension to George C. Rust.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of George C. Rust, of Weakley County, Tennessee, be, and the same is hereby, placed on the pension-roll of the soldiers of the war of 1812, at the rate allowed by law to the private soldiers of said war.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill granting a pension to George C. Rust, of Weakley County, Tennessee, would respectfully report as follows:

That the said Rust made his application for a pension under act of 1871, to the Pension Office, as a soldier of the war of 1812; that his application was rejected in April, 1873, because of the want of record evidence of his service and failure to prove it by the testimony of two comrades. Mr. Rust established his claim by the testimony of Ezekiel Arnold, his comrade, who was duly pensioned. The said Arnold is now dead, and was then the only surviving comrade of the said Rust so far as he could ascertain.

The said Rust has always been known by general reputation as a soldier of the war of 1812, and as having been engaged in the battles of New Orleans and Horse Shoe, and at the latter place he was wounded in the knee, from which he was ever after lame. The said Rust is now over eighty-seven years of age and very destitute, being an actual inmate of the poor-house.

The above facts are all substantiated by papers submitted in the case, and thereupon your committee would respectfully recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

HIRAM JOHNSON.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 163) granting a pension to Hiram Johnson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Hiram Johnson, late a private in Company A, Seventy-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act, for scrotal hernia, the rate of disability to be ascertained and determined by the Commissioner of Pensions under existing laws.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 163) granting a pension to Hiram Johnson, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

The Senate Pension Committee report on the bill is favorable, and as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 163) granting a pension to Hiram Johnson, having duly considered the same, make the following report:

"That a bill was introduced in the Senate during the Forty-sixth Congress, first session, granting a pension to Hiram Johnson, which was reported favorably, and passed the Senate, but failed to become a law for want of time. Your committee find that Hiram Johnson was a private in Company A, Seventy-ninth Illinois Volunteers. He enlisted July 15, 1862, and was discharged March 2, 1863, upon surgeon's certificate of disability, resulting from scrotal hernia. He applied for pension November 17, 1869, and his claim was rejected April 4, 1877, upon the ground that the hernia existed before enlistment.

"There is evidence tending to show that Johnson had scrotal hernia in childhood, but this appears to have been cured. The soldier was carefully examined at the time of his enlistment, and accepted as a sound, healthy recruit. This action on the part of the Government ought to be regarded as conclusive upon the question. The evidence is clear that while marching in the night, in October, 1862, near Perryville, Kentucky, he fell into a ditch, and was so badly ruptured that he was compelled to retain the parts with his hands in order to continue the march to Nashville, where he remained in general hospital till discharged, as above stated. The disability has continued to the present time, but the committee are unable to determine the degree, the latest evidence on this point being the certificate of an examining surgeon in 1872, at which date his incapacity was rated at one-half.

"Your committee therefore recommend the passage of Senate bill No. 163."

Your committee, in reviewing this case, is in doubt as to the justice of the conclusions reached by the Senate committee.

There is nothing found in evidence to show that the examination of this soldier, at the time of his enlistment, was different in any respect from that ordinarily made of men for the volunteer service.

It is an established principle of law and practice in the Pension Office that a disability proceeding from an aggravation of an injury or disease existing prior to the service is not pensionable. This is clearly a case of this class. The soldier rendered about three months' service before receiving the injury which resulted in the service, rupture, from the consequences of which he suffers. To give him a pension would unjustly discriminate against many soldiers of longer service whose claims have been rejected on the same ground. The rule in the Pension Office is that six successive months of field service creates a presumption of previous soundness.

This committee does not feel justified to recommend legislation tending to override this wise and liberal ruling, and therefore reports adversely on the bill, and asks to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. BROWNE. As the report in this case is adverse, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

S. ANNIE ESTERBROOK.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 725) granting a pension to S. Annie Esterbrook.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of S. Annie Esterbrook, widow of George W. Esterbrook, late captain of Company A, First New Hampshire Cavalry.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 725) granting a pension to S. Annie Esterbrook, has had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The Committee on Pensions, United States Senate, has fully considered the bill presented in behalf of the claimant, as appears from its report, as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill granting a pension to S. Annie Esterbrook, having carefully examined the same, make the following report:

"That the claimant, S. Annie Esterbrook, is the widow of the late George W. Esterbrook, who was captain Company A, First New Hampshire Cavalry. It appears from the evidence that George W. Esterbrook was originally pensioned under certificate No. 41570 at $17 per month, to commence on the 4th of January, 1865, for gunshot wound in his right hip and shell wound of right side of face; that on the 3d of January, 1867, this pension was reduced to $13.33 per month; that on December 1, 1875, the pension of the said George W. Esterbrook was increased to $20 per month, which amount of pension he was receiving at the time of his death, December 29, 1879. At the time of the death of the husband of claimant he was employed in the custom-house at Boston, being assigned to duty at the freight depot of the Boston and Maine Railroad, in Boston. It appears from the evidence that the husband of claimant was badly crippled by his wound, and therefore slow of locomotion, and that, on account of his crippled condition and inability to move rapidly, he met his death by being run over by a locomotive. Two persons were the sole witnesses of the accident, and they both make affidavits to the effect that, in their judgment, Esterbrook would have been able to escape had it not been for his crippled condition.

"The following letter from the Commissioner of Pensions is in evidence to show cause why claimant did not ask for a pension under the general law:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference, of the inclosed memorial of Mrs. S. A. Esterbrook, together with the other papers, asking relief on account of the death of her husband, George W. Esterbrook, late captain Company A, First New Hampshire Cavalry, and to inform you that the records of this office fail to exhibit any evidence that an application has been filed by Mrs. Esterbrook.

It appears that Captain Esterbrook was pensioned on account of gunshot wound of the right hip, and shell wound of right side of face, by certificate No. 44570, at the rate of $20 per month, which amount is presumed to have been paid to the date of his death.

If it is true, as stated by the widow, that Captain Esterbrook's death was the result of a railroad accident, which occurred subsequent to the date of his discharge from the service, the widow is not entitled to pension under the general law.

Very respectfully,

J. W. BENTLEY, Commissioner.

Hon. E. H. ROLLINS, United States Senate.

"A favorable report in this case was made by the Committee on Pensions during the third session of Forty-sixth Congress, but failed to become a law for want of time. In view of the above circumstances, your committee regard the case as a just one, and report back the bill (S. No. 725) with the recommendation that it pass."

This committee is of opinion that the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore concurs in the conclusions reached in the report above quoted.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELLEN LARDNER.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 1576) granting a pension to Ellen Lardner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen Lardner, widow of the late Rear-Admiral James L. Lardner, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month.

Mr. McMILLAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 1576) granting a pension to Ellen Lardner, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

The claimant is the widow of Rear-Admiral James L. Lardner, who died April 12, 1881, after more than sixty years of faithful and meritorious services, as appears from the following order issued by the Navy Department:

GENERAL ORDER.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 15, 1881.

The Navy Department announces with regret to the Navy and Marine Corps the death at Philadelphia on the 12th instant of Rear-Admiral James L. Lardner, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

Rear-Admiral Lardner was appointed a midshipman from the State of Pennsylvania May 10, 1820, and his whole career in the service was marked by purity of character, intelligence, and devotion to duty. He was commissioned a captain May 19, 1861, and was conspicuous as the commanding officer of the frigate Susquehanna in the battle of Port Royal—so much so as to call forth general orders from the commander-in-chief commending the valuable services of the ship and the gallantry of her captain, officers, and crew.

May 19, 1862, he was appointed to command the East Gulf blockading squadron, which, however, he had to relinquish in December of the same year on account of an attack of yellow fever.

July 16, 1862, he was commissioned a commodore, and from June, 1863, to October, 1864, commanded the West India squadron. November 20, 1864, in accordance with the provisions of general statutes, he was placed on the retired list, and promoted to be a rear-admiral thereon July 25, 1866.

Among the many prominent commands which he held was that of governor of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, from June, 1869, to June, 1872, for which he was particularly fitted by his experience and sympathetic nature.

In respect to his memory, it is hereby ordered that on the day after the receipt hereof the flags of the navy-yards and stations and vessels in commission be displayed at half-mast from sunrise to sunset, and thirteen minute-guns be fired at noon from the navy-yards and stations, flag-ships, and vessels acting singly.

WILLIAM N. JEFFERS,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Dr. Henry H. Smith, the attending physician, certifies that Rear-Admiral James L. Lardner died in Philadelphia April 12, 1881, of uræmia, or blood poisoning, due to disordered action of the kidneys and liver, and that this was for some time preceded by mental paresis and hallucinations, originating, in his opinion, in the anxiety and mental strain connected with the performance of his official duties, especially during the late rebellion.

The widow is in needy circumstances, and as the bill provides for a pension usually paid to the widows of officers of the rank of her deceased husband, the committee reports favorably on the bill, and asks that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY E. AMBRESTER.

The next business was the bill (S. No. 144) granting a pension to Mary E. Ambrester.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws the name of Mary E. Ambrester, widow of Jerome Ambrester, late a private in Company G, First Maryland Infantry Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 144) granting a pension to Mary E. Ambrester, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

An examination of the papers on file in the Pension Office shows that the report of the Committee on Pensions correctly and fully sets forth all the facts shown by the evidence presented by the claimant, and, concurring in the conclusions reached by that body, this committee adopts said report, and the recommendation made therein, as its own, which is as follows:

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary E. Ambrester, praying for a pension, have carefully examined the same, and report:

"That the petitioner is the widow of Jerome Ambrester, late a private in Company G, First Maryland Infantry Volunteers, who was wounded in the right shoulder and in the ear and head, on the 18th day of August, 1864, by a minnie ball, on the Weldon Railroad, while in the line of his duty.

"At the time of his death, December 1, 1877, he was in receipt of a pension for the wounds described above, and the widow now prays to have the pension continued to herself and his children.

"Dr. Robert C. Carter states in affidavit that he attended the soldier during several attacks in the last year of his life; that his disease was abscess of the right lung, in the last and fatal attack of which he died, December 1, 1877. There was a fluctuating tumor beneath the scapula connecting with the cavity of the chest, which tumor could be considerably reduced by pressure.

"It is affiant's opinion, having learned that there was no predisposition to consumption in his (the soldier's) family, that the cause of his death was inflammation superinduced by the wound received in the Army.

"R. H. Tuft, M. D., testifies that he examined and treated the soldier for a wound in the right shoulder at different times since his discharge, and removed fragments of bone from the scapula; attended him for phthisis, and has no doubt that the consumption was the result of the gunshot wound of the right shoulder.

"The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the widow's claim on the ground that the soldier's death was not caused by his military service.

"It is the opinion of your committee that the evidence of the physicians quoted above is evidence of the origin of the disease from which the soldier died, and that his widow and children are entitled to a pension. They therefore recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be granted, and urge the passage of the accompanying bill."

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

CORNELIA F. WHITE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 802) granting a pension to Mrs. Cornelia F. White.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Cornelia F. White, widow of Frank I. White, late an officer in the United States Volunteer Army.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK NELSON, T. CAINE, AND HENRY C. SANDERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4982) granting a pension to Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and R. Sanders.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and R. Sanders, of Wyoming Territory, late employés of the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, who were severely wounded and disabled for life, while connected with Major Thornburgh's expedition, in the engagement with the Ute Indians, September 29, 1879, and the pensions allowed them be respectively at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out "R." and insert "Henry C.," so it will read "Henry C. Sanders."

Strike out "and the pensions allowed them respectively at the rate of $30 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting pensions to Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and Henry C. Sanders."

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read. These parties seem to have been in the Quartermaster-General's Department.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4982) granting a pension to Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and R. Sanders, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

In support of the bill, claimants present the certificates of Captain James Gillis, assistant quartermaster United States Army, and R. S. Vickery, assistant surgeon United States Army, at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyoming Territory.

Captain Gillis certifies that at the time of the fight of Major T. T. Thornburg, Fourth United States Infantry, with the Ute Indians on Milk River, Colorado, September 29, 1879, Henry C. Sanders was in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department as a citizen blacksmith. Also, that at said time and place Frederick Nelson and Thomas Cain were employed as teamsters in the Quartermaster's Department.

Surgeon Vickery certifies as follows:

"The following-named men, employés in the Quartermaster's Department, were with the command of Captain S. S. Payne, Fifth Cavalry, in action with the Ute Indians on Milk River, Colorado, September 29, 1879, and were wounded in that action, and were received into this hospital October 19, 1879, with other wounded men from the same field.

"Their condition then was as follows:

"Frederick Nelson, gunshot wound of left shoulder, the bullet passing over and grazing the bone; gunshot wound of left leg, the ball entering at lower and outer border of left thigh, ranging downward; it still remains deeply lodged among the muscles. He had also scars of wounds received in the war of the rebellion, a shell wound fracturing the right leg, and a flesh wound of neck from rifle-ball. He was in this hospital until March 2, 1880, and still remains totally disabled, the result of his wounds.

"Henry C. Sanders, wound from rifle-ball passing across back part of left knee, wounding the bone and opening the joint. As the result of it there has been much inflammation and an immense amount of suppuration all along the leg and thigh. He is still confined to bed in hospital, but is now recovering. Totally and permanently disabled.

"Thomas Cain, bullet wound of chest, right side; the ball entered over third rib and came out between seventh and eighth rib, fracturing the ribs and perforating the lung. He was discharged from hospital, wound healed, January 5, 1880."

There is also on file the following statement by Captain J. S. Payne, Fifth Cavalry, commanding the expedition against the Utes, indorsed upon letter addressed to him by Frederick Nelson:

"Nelson was with my command as teamster in the campaign last fall, and served in that capacity faithfully. During the affair of Milk River, September 29-October 5, he did the duty of a soldier courageously and cheerfully until he received a painful wound, from which he is now suffering and by which he is disabled for life. His conduct came under my personal observation, and I take pleasure in recommending that a pension be granted him."

In addition to the above there is on file the following house joint resolution and memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Wyoming Territory:

"To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wyoming, respectfully represent that H. C. Sanders, Fred. Nelson, and Thomas Kane, citizens of this Territory, while in the employ of the United States Government, and doing duty as soldiers under the orders of officers of the United States Army, were wounded and permanently disabled in an engagement with the Ute Indians at Milk River, Colorado, said engagement being known to the country as the 'Thornburg massacre.'

"And your petitioners would further represent that these persons being disabled for life while protecting the property of the United States, and taking arms against the public enemy in obedience to Army authority, are entitled to relief of a suitable pension in each case, such as the gratitude and liberality of a great power naturally award to its defenders at all times.

"As under existing United States laws there are no provisions by which claims of this class can be adjudicated and allowed, your petitioners pray that the persons hereinbefore mentioned, upon showing by proper affidavits their authorized service of and employment by the Government, their presence at the action named, and that the wounds there received have caused permanent disability, may obtain relief at your hands by the passage of an act granting to said persons such a pension as the presentation of facts and circumstances in each case may seem to warrant. And for such action by this memorial your petitioners, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wyoming, will ever pray.

"Be it resolved, That the secretary of the Territory of Wyoming be requested to forward a copy of this memorial to Hon. M. E. POST, Delegate in Congress, and that he be instructed to use his best endeavors to secure the result prayed for therein."

The committee are of opinion that the claimants are entitled to the relief asked for, and therefore report favorably on the same with the following amendments: Strike out the letter "R." before the word Sanders, in the title of the bill and in line 6, and insert instead in both places the following: "Henry C.;" also strike out all after the word "seventy-nine," in line 11; and thus amended, ask that it do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. It appears that these parties were not in the military service of the United States, and as we have been trying to prevent the establishment of a civil list until those injured in the military service have had their cases acted on, I do not think this bill should pass.

Mr. DAWES. But these men were injured in an Indian fight.

Mr. McMILLIN. They were not in the military service of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. But they were fighting Indians.

Mr. McCOOK. If the gentleman from Tennessee will recall the extraordinary circumstances of this Indian fight I think he will agree that this bill should pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. None recall the circumstances of that Indian fight with more pain than I do.

Mr. McCOOK. They had to arm and fight, and did fight.

Mr. DAWES. One of these men was shot twice, and has a bullet in his body. He was also wounded in the war of the rebellion.

Mr. BROWNE. I have stood by my colleague in the steadfast refusal to report favorably, so far as my vote is concerned, to place any civil employé on the pension-rolls. I voted, however, cheerfully for a favorable report in this case for the reason that these men with arms in hands fought valiantly. They were performing the duties of soldiers with arms under the extraordinary circumstance of which the country is aware, and they were wounded, and I think they should go on the pension-roll.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. As I understand the case this man was a teamster.

Mr. DAWES. There are three of them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. He was never enlisted or mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. McCOOK. He was enlisted as a teamster.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But never enlisted into the military service of the United States.

Mr. McCOOK. This command was surrounded on Milk River by Ute Indians, and every man was armed and had to fight.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand that.

Mr. McCOOK. As a fighting man he was wounded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have a case much stronger. I introduced a bill in favor of John B. Tucker, a man who was enlisted for the purpose of suppressing the rebellion. He had not been actually mustered into the service, but while waiting to be mustered into the service the Fourth of July came around, and he was ordered by the commanding officer of the fort to fire a salute, and in firing that salute both of his arms were taken off.

A MEMBER. He was not wounded fighting Indians.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is not the case of a man fighting Indians or anything of that sort. Both arms were taken off. He has a number of children and no means to support them, and to-day is supported by the charity of a county of my district. I have introduced a bill for his relief, which has never yet been reached and never will be. I think, therefore, as there are three in this bill this man should be added to make four. If the committee is willing to insert his name in this bill I have no objection to letting it pass.

This man is in an absolutely destitute condition, as is certified to by the affidavits on file with the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I think the committee should pass his bill inasmuch as a number of far less merit than his have been reported, but owing to the large amount of business before the committee it has not been reached. I ask, then, that the name of that man be included as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. BROWNE. As we have 1,500 pension bills undisposed of before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I hope gentlemen will avail themselves of this opportunity to present their cases as amendments to this bill. It will be an expeditious way of disposing of them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If I could get at my bill——

Mr. REED. I think you must see the propriety of surrendering the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not surrender it, but I will allow the gentleman to ask me any question.

Mr. BROWNE. I will ask the gentleman a question. Are you opposed to this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I say I may be. I desire to say the evidence is clear, and there is no controversy about it, that this man, while waiting to be mustered into the service, when the Fourth of July came around was ordered to fire a salute, and while firing a salute had both his arms taken off.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask if he has been before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and called their attention to this particular case?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not in person, but I did see the member who had special charge of the bill, and appealed to him to take it up. He gave me as his excuse for delay that there were many cases pending before the committee and each of the members of the committee had so much to do in their consideration that he had not time to reach it. Now, we expect to adjourn in two or three weeks, and I fear unless this case is reached at once it will not receive any attention whatever. I have no reflection to make upon the committee, but this is a case demanding consideration. This is a man who is unable to support his family; he has, unfortunately for him, or for them, a number of children dependent upon him, and he is now a charge upon the charity of Hardin County, Illinois, which supports him. He was a bona fide soldier who risked his life in the service, and not a man who comes before you asking relief on any imaginary claim.

Mr. STEELE. I understood the gentleman to say that he had not been mustered into the service.

Mr. BROWNE. Suppose he had been mustered into the service; what difference?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The commandant of the post, who was a regular Army officer, directed him to perform this service in which he lost his arms, and if he had refused to perform it he would have been court-martialed and punished, or dishonorably dismissed from the service.

Mr. REED. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that he will, upon consideration, not insist upon this matter, as we sit here under the permission of the House to consider bills which have been reported by the Committee on Pensions or Invalid Pensions.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand the jurisdiction of this House. It is ample at this time to take up and consider a case of this character.

Mr. REED. We cannot do it under the order of the House by which this session is held. That order, the gentleman will find, provides that this session is for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and this has not been reported from a committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will ask that the rule be read under which the House is meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. It has already been read once for the information of the committee, but at the request of the gentleman will be again read.

The Clerk read the special order under which the session was held.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This, now, Mr. Chairman, is an exceptional case. It is no advantage to me whatever, and I am governed simply by humane motives in asking its consideration. I submit that we are now in session to consider pension cases, and it strikes me that we have ample power under the order which has just been read to even amend the order, if necessary, to take up and consider a case of this kind. My proposition is to amend the bill that is now pending, the Chair will observe, and I am serious and in deep earnest about this matter. If gentlemen desire the evidence as to the character of this claim I can have it brought before the House in a few moments. It is as clear as the noon-day sun that this man has a strong and impregnable case, and one that will commend itself to the consideration of everybody who examines it. It is no fictitious case.

Mr. PARKER. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we are consuming unnecessary time in this discussion, and I make the point of order that this proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is not germane to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How many names are included in the pending bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Three.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would like to know upon what principle of parliamentary law this amendment can be excluded from the pending bill as the fourth name.

Mr. PRESCOTT. There is a bill now pending——

Mr. REED. It is the substance of a bill now pending.

Mr. BROWNE. It is the bill now pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If, Mr. Chairman, I desired to raise a point of order I, too, could raise one which would offset the other and defeat the consideration of all of these bills by raising the question of a quorum. It seems to me that gentlemen should waive the point of order on this particular bill, since I am not pressing the other point of order which would defeat the consideration of any of them.

Mr. BROWNE. If the gentleman desires to raise the question of no quorum, he can do it of course upon his own responsibility.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. When you are attempting to grant pensions to mere teamsters and men in the Indian wars, I claim that it would be about as righteous and humane on my part to raise the point of order of no quorum against such bills as it is for you to raise the point of order upon this gallant Union soldier who lost both arms in the defense of his country. I see no reason why you should raise the point of order upon this bill that would not be equally proper to induce me to raise a question of order against the one you are now seeking to pass.

Mr. BROWNE. The gentleman is entirely at liberty to do it; he understands his responsibility.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not desire, sir, to raise the point of order upon any soldier or any man who served his country. I have no objection to the bill, but I simply ask that justice be done to another soldier, who, it strikes me, and I am sure every man here who has a heart with a spark of humanity in it will agree with me, is entitled to your consideration under the circumstances I have presented. I think gentlemen should not attempt to make an objection to pensioning this poor man. It is demanded as an act of justice as well as humanity. Especially should they be willing to waive technical points when I am willing to have the testimony brought here, as I have said, and have his case tried upon sworn testimony and its absolute merits. I have sat here, sir, and seen night after night and day after day for the last six months meritorious questions of this kind which have been defeated for the want of a moment's consideration in the House. I have a case now that I am satisfied not a man with humane instincts would object to if he would take a moment's time to consider it; and when you are proceeding to put upon the pension list civilians who never were mustered into the service I feel that it is my solemn duty to this poor soldier—a pauper, with a helpless wife and children dependent upon him—that his case should have some consideration. He gave to his country all the means he had of supporting himself and his family, and yet you say you will not stop to consider this case of a gallant Union soldier when you are considering the cases of teamsters and civilians. It strikes me, therefore, that gentlemen should not raise the question of order upon this, when I refrain from raising the question of a quorum on the case that is now under consideration.

If there was an opportunity before the Committee on Invalid Pensions to have this case disposed of I would not press it now; but I know that in the nature of things it will not be considered during this session by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order. The point of order was raised against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND.] The Chair sustained the point of order; and I undertake to say the gentleman is now out of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am ready to argue the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will be in order. The point of order has been decided.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire, with all deference to the Chair and to the gentleman who raised the point of order, to have the grounds of the question of order submitted. The gentleman has said, as any parrot might say, simply that he raises the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that he proposes to introduce as an amendment to the pending bill the substance of a bill already pending before the House and that such an amendment is not in order.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will not yield to a demand for the regular order. But I am ready to yield to the decision of the Chair, if the Chair, having considered the question, is of opinion that the amendment I have offered is out of order. But the gentleman who raised the point of order raised it simply as a parrot might do without giving any reasons. But if the Chair on due consideration decides that the amendment is not in order, I bow to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest the propriety of passing over this bill informally, as we have done with all similar cases of this kind. On the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] at the beginning of this evening's session we passed over the cases reported by the committee on eight or ten pages of the Calendar. Those who are familiar with the Calendar will remember the majority of those cases have been passed over from week to week for the reason that they were propositions to place on the pension-roll those who were engaged in the civil service.

Mr. McMILLIN. Not all of them.
Mr. PRESCOTT. All but two, I think.
Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman on examination will find there are more than that.
Mr. PEELLE. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he does not think this bill ought to pass?
Mr. McMILLIN. I will state briefly I do not think we ought to enter upon the pensioning of persons upon the civil list until we have done something for the vast number of applicants, more than a quarter of a million, whose applications are pending undetermined in the Pension Office, and for the thousands and tens of thousands of those who have fought in other wars.
Mr. PEELLE. The gentleman ought to make a distinction between those on the civil list who have applied for pensions and the teamster whose case is embraced in this bill, surrounded as he was, in charge of Government property and under the necessity of fighting his way out. Can the gentleman not make a distinction between this case and the cases of persons on the ordinary civil list?
Mr. McMILLIN. I concede there is a distinction between this and some other civil cases, because we have on the Calendar bills for the pensioning of persons who never were engaged in any kind of military service. But when I see how eagerly gentlemen grapple for precedents and how far they will reach for one at all analogous to justify subsequent action, I see how important it is that we do not take a step in the direction of pensioning persons in the civil service.
Mr. McCOOK. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] will remember that in the Forty-fifty Congress a bill of somewhat similar character was passed pensioning the widows of some men, civilians, who were engaged in an Indian fight in the Territory of Montana.
Mr. McMILLIN. I do not remember the case to which my friend refers. So far as I am individually concerned no bill has ever passed here with less than a quorum present, pensioning a civilian, when I knew the fact.
Mr. McCOOK. I do not recall the circumstances under which the bill I refer to passed the committee or the House; but my impression is it passed without a dissenting voice.
Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest that we will save time by passing this bill over informally.
Mr. DAWES. I call the attention of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, to a case which was reported favorably by the Committee on Invalid Pensions; the case of a saddler who was intrusted with the carrying of dispatches and was severely frozen. That was the case of a civilian who volunteered to perform the duties of a soldier, and he was allowed a pension. The service he performed was at some point in Arkansas.
Mr. McMILLIN. I do not remember the case. Out of the thousand and more cases that come before our committee I am unable to recall the case the gentleman from Ohio speaks of. I do not say such a case has not occurred, but I do say that with my knowledge, with less than a quorum present, a pension has not been granted in such a case.
Mr. DAWES. Several cases of this kind have been passed where the man performed the duty of a soldier under command of the officers. These men under command of officers went into the battle and acted as heroic soldiers. While fighting in that battle they were shot, and they ought to be pensioned. They were defending the United States property and were doing the work of United States soldiers under the command of officers of the Army, whereas thousands of the men whose claims are now pending in the Pension Office never smelled powder at all.
Mr. McMILLIN. I take the broad ground that to pass this bill is not doing justice to the constituents of the gentleman from Ohio or to the constituents of any other members who enlisted in the service and who have pension claims that cannot be acted upon for three years. That is the position in which we find ourselves to-night.
Mr. STEELE. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he is not dodging the question?
Mr. McMILLIN. I am not dodging the question.
Mr. STEELE. The gentleman is asked the question whether or not he is opposed to this bill, and he says he is opposed to it until other men are provided for.
Mr. McMILLIN. I am opposed——
Mr. STEELE. I submit that we have by law provided for every man who can prove that he is entitled to a pension, and their cases are being acted on every day.
Mr. McMILLIN. Then if the pension laws are not broad enough make the general laws extend until they are broad enough.
Mr. STEELE. They are broad enough.
Mr. McMILLIN. Then stand by them.
Mr. STEELE. We do stand by them.
Mr. DAWES. Can the gentleman find any other three men in the history of the nation who did what these men did?
Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose that there are no three trees in the forest that are exactly alike, if you examine them with a microscope.
Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. What is the question before the committee?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] has asked that this bill be passed over informally.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to say a few words upon this case. It seems to me that we ought to act to-night upon the case of these three men. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. McMILLIN,] will not, I trust, suggest that he is going to raise the question of a quorum, because that would be against the spirit of good nature and kindness that has existed all through these evening sessions. It has been understood that as a matter of good will and duty to our soldiers, their widows and their orphan children, we should not throw their cases over by raising the question of a quorum.
As to the question of order which I raised upon a bill, the gentleman will see that this case is based upon a certain state of facts set forth in the report. His case must be based upon another state of facts to be stated in the report. If his man is entitled to a pension, he is entitled to it as a man having lost both arms. In this case there can be a pension of only $8 a month. I am inclined, upon his statement of facts, to support his bill whenever it may come before the House.
Now, I do not see why a man should not be pensioned if he obeys the orders of the military officers of his country and is injured while acting in obedience to those orders. There are different circumstances, different times, different places to be considered in these several cases. The two cases cannot be mixed up without violating all the rules of our practice.
And I would say one word further as to the position of these men. They were there not as armed men; but when they were attacked they entered the ranks and acted with the soldiers on the spot. They fought and were wounded. They were soldiers in fact. They were mustered in by the act of shedding their blood there. That I submit is enough. They were acting as soldiers, they were soldiers in fact, brave soldiers, devoted soldiers.
Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] withdraws his point.
Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw it.
Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to state, in response to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. PARKER,] that I do not wish to raise any question of a quorum which will block the way to considering any soldier's case. For that reason I made the suggestion I did, that this case be passed informally. I did so for the purpose of not being forced to the necessity under the circumstances of preventing the consideration of any soldier's case.
Mr. PARKER. I believe from the liberality and general good judgment of the gentleman that he will treat these men as they were, acting as soldiers at the time of the massacre which has become historical and is known world-wide, because of the heroism, bravery, and devotion which they displayed there. I trust the gentleman will be willing to treat them as soldiers in fact.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion to lay aside the bill to be reported favorably to the House.
The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 36, noes none.
Mr. McMILLIN. No quorum has voted.
Mr. PARKER. I understood the gentleman to say that he would not raise the question of a quorum.
Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir; I said that I would not raise the question of a quorum on any soldier's claim. I never have done so, and do not expect to do so on any soldier's claim. I made the suggestion I did to my friend in order to avoid the necessity of raising a question which would for a moment even hinder the consideration of a soldier's claim.
The CHAIRMAN. The point being that no quorum voted, the Chair will appoint tellers; and the gentleman from New York, Mr. PARKER, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. McMILLIN, will take their places as tellers.
Mr. McMILLIN. I do not wish to block business in committee to-night, especially as I am a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I am willing, therefore, that this bill be reported to the House with the understanding that the House will not act upon it until there is a quorum present.
Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I hope that will be done.
There was no objection; and the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN DWYER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 5299) granting an increase of pension to John Dwyer.
The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John Dwyer, formerly a private in Company C, Fourth Regiment United States Cavalry, to the sum of $50 per month, for the loss of eyesight.

Mr. McMILLIN. Read the report.
The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5299) granting an increase of pension to John Dwyer, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:
John Dwyer served in various organizations of the regular Army from 1847 to September 17, 1868, when discharged upon surgeon's certificate of disability, setting forth that the soldier is suffering from "amaurosis of both eyes, which has existed for the last eight months, contracted in the line of duty. His sight is so impaired that it is impossible for him to distinguish near objects."
He was allowed a pension at $20 per month from date of discharge, and $24 per month from June 4, 1872, the rate now received by him, because the disability disqualifies him for the performance of any manual labor. His application for increase has been rejected because he is not so totally blind as to require the regular aid and attendance of another person.

The medical evidence in the case shows that the left eye is totally blind, while the vision in the right eye is limited to simple perception. He can distinguish a man from a woman, but not features, and does require the attention of another person in preparing and placing his food before him, as well as guiding and assisting him to the ordinary wants and comforts of life.

The committee is of opinion that sufficient is shown that the pensioner, although not totally blind according to the strict letter of the law, is totally blind for all practical purposes, and having served his country faithfully for more than twenty years, is inclined to grant the relief asked for, and therefore reports favorably on the bill, and recommends that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY A. SANDERS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 1989) granting a pension to Mary A. Sanders.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Sanders, widow of T. A. Sanders, late a scout in the United States Army.

Mr. McMILLIN. Read the report in that case.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1989) granting a pension to Mary A. Sanders, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

From the papers before the committee it appears that Mary A. Sanders is the widow of Thomas A. Sanders, who was employed as a scout in the military service of the United States during the late war, and was captured and killed by the confederates in McNairy County, State of Tennessee, about July 29, 1864. Her claim has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that her husband was not an enlisted man; neither was he of the class of persons provided for by the third paragraph of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes.

Among the papers in support of her claim is the affidavit of G. M. Dodge, late brigadier-general, United States Army, and commanding the post of Corinth, Mississippi. The affiant states that the name of T. A. Sanders is familiar to him, and that it is his impression that said Sanders was with the affiant as a scout, and that he was killed or died while he was in said service. The fact that affiant had a large number of men engaged in similar service makes it impossible for him to make a definite statement at this late day.

Fielding Hurst, late colonel of the Sixth Regiment of West Tennessee Cavalry, testifies that he well knew Thomas A. Sanders, late of McNairy County, Tennessee, who entered the United States service as a scout the first night after the first transports of the United States troops landed at Crump's Landing, Tennessee; had possession of Sanders's appointment until after the Shiloh fight and during the siege of Corinth. Some time subsequently affiant was asked by General Dodge whether said Sanders was a true and reliable Unionist, to which affiant responded affirmatively. General Dodge then informed the affiant that Sanders was employed by him as a scout, and that he (Sanders) on several occasions had ventured too far for his own good. When first employed Sanders acted under the directions of General Lew. Wallace. Affiant was near Memphis about the time Sanders was killed, and knows nothing personally as to the circumstances under which he came to his death. The fact that said Sanders was employed as a scout is also shown by the affidavits of Calvin Shell and J. B. Mills, of McNairy County, Tennessee.

Angelina Small and Mary Sanders testify that said Thomas A. Sanders was taken a prisoner by a captain of General Forrest's command, while at his father's house, July 29, 1864, and that about four days thereafter he was killed by said forces.

William J. Russell testifies that he was a private in Captain Russell's company of confederate troops, and while on a scout near Tuscumbia, Tennessee, about July, 1863, said Thomas A. Sanders was taken prisoner and charged with being a Union spy. The morning after the capture Sanders was sent under guard to their headquarters, after which affiant saw no more of said Sanders; that Sanders was employed as a scout with the Union army is known to affiant from information received direct from him (Sanders) some twelve months previous to his capture.

W. F. Moore, also of McNairy County, Tennessee, testifies that he was acquainted with Sanders in his lifetime, and saw him after he was shot and assisted in his burial. He was shot within one-half mile of affiant's residence, and he heard the report of the guns when he was killed. Affiant knew nothing of his connection with the Army, except by rumor, and that he was acting as a Federal spy, and his killing was because of that service.

The claimant's marriage to Thomas A. Sanders, on the 30th of October, 1846, is shown by the certificate of the proper court. She has six children, all of whom, however, are now over the age of sixteen years.

The committee are fully satisfied by the evidence in the case that Thomas A. Sanders was employed and rendered efficient service in the Union Army as a scout, and that he came to his death at the hands of the confederates by reason of such service. They therefore report favorably and recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1989) granting a pension to Mary A. Sanders.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH ROBB.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6226) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Robb.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Sarah Robb, widow of Hamilton Robb, late chaplain of the Forty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. CULLEN. I will call attention to the fact that there is an adverse report in this case, although the Calendar does not show it.

Mr. CANNON. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6226) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Robb, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

Mrs. Sarah Robb, of Mattoon, Illinois, who is seventy-five years of age, is the widow of Hamilton Robb, late chaplain of the Forty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. It appears from the records in the Adjutant-General's Office that said Hamilton Robb was mustered into service as chaplain Forty-sixth Indiana Volunteers January 10, 1863, to serve three years, and is reported "present for duty" from that date until February 29, 1864. He is reported as captured by the enemy April 8, 1864, and unconditionally released and rejoined regiment July 30, 1864. Subsequent rolls report him present for duty to September 4, 1865, at which date he was mustered out at Louisville, Kentucky.

J. M. Watts, late adjutant, Forty-sixth Indiana Volunteers, states that he was acquainted with Hamilton Robb, and that he was chaplain in the regiment of which he (Watts) was adjutant.

His widow prays Congress for a pension, on the ground of her extreme age and poverty and broken-down health. She is seventy-five years of age, and dependent on the charity of her neighbors for support. Yet your committee do not feel justified in recommending favorable action, believing the precedent to be a dangerous one; and therefore recommend that the bill do not pass.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the committee to bear with me for a minute or two while I call attention to the facts of this case. I knew Hamilton Robb very well, probably for twenty years prior to his death. He was a most excellent man, a Baptist preacher, who had been a member of that denomination and a minister on the frontier for a long life-time. When the war broke out, or a short time afterward, as the report states, he went into the war as chaplain of an Indiana regiment, and served to the end of the war, doing excellent service, as is shown by the proof from all the officers of the regiment and many of the men. After he was discharged he removed to the State of Illinois, where he resided until his death, depending for the last five years of his life upon the charity of the community in which he lived. It is not pretended that he died on account of injury received or disease contracted while in the Army. If he be allowed a pension at all, it must be on another ground.

It is known to gentleman here and known to the country that soldiers of the war of the Revolution, soldiers of 1812, and their widows, long before they reached the age of seventy-five and eighty years respectively, even though they had served but ten days, were placed upon the pension-rolls; and long before soldiers of the late war reach the age of eighty, or their widows the age of seventy-five, they will be placed upon the pension-roll.

Hamilton Robb is dead; and therefore he will not have the advantage or disadvantage, whichever it may be, of being placed upon that roll. He died last January. His widow, poverty-stricken and subsisting upon charity—with nothing but the cold charity of the world between her and the poor-house—is now seventy-five years of age, and she will be dead before this general law passes.

In view of these facts, I appeal to this committee and the House to anticipate in her case the general law, and give the old lady, to save her from the poor-house during the short time that she has yet to live, the bare pittance that will keep soul and body together. I do not believe that I shall appeal in vain. I ask the committee to report this bill to the House with a favorable recommendation. I have some feeling about this matter because I knew this man, and I know his widow. This is all I have to say.

Mr. CULLEN. I wish to say just one word in justification of the report.

Mr. CANNON. I am not attacking the report.

Mr. CULLEN. My sympathies are with my colleague [Mr. CANNON] and with this old lady. Upon the ground that this old gentleman did not come to his death, and it is not claimed that he came to his death, in the military service, or that his death was hastened by such service, the pension being asked solely on the ground of the old lady's age and dependency, the committee did not think they could step so far beyond the law in anticipation of what may occur many years hence.

As I have said, my sympathies are with this old lady, and I would have been very glad if we could have made a favorable report in this case.

Mr. CANNON. One word further and I am done. I have been a member of this House for almost ten years. It so happens that I represent an agricultural district, without rivers and harbors, without public buildings or anything of that kind. The passage of this bill, carrying this paltry pension, to do this meed of justice to this old woman, anticipating in her case the general law, is the first favor I have asked of this House during my service in Congress. This is all that I can say.

The question being taken on laying the bill aside to be favorably reported to the House, there were—ayes 20, noes 15.

Mr. McMILLIN. No quorum has voted. I simply ask that in this case we follow the same rule as in others when it has been proposed to override the report of the committee that such action shall not be taken without the presence of a quorum.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the bill be favorably reported to the House; and if it be desired, a vote can be taken on it in the House when there is a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection that disposition will be made of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. What disposition?

The CHAIRMAN. It is suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation, and that it be taken up in the House when there is a quorum present. This is the same action that was taken in a previous case.

Mr. CANNON. I hope that will not be done. It is equivalent to no action on the case.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will not object to that course, although I prefer it should not be taken.

Mr. MATSON. I object.

Mr. PARKER. I hope that arrangement will be made, with the understanding that no one will object to taking the bill up in the House and acting upon it when there is a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee insist on the point of no quorum?

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not withdraw it except on the condition it should, like the bill passed a few moments ago, not be considered in the House except with a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that disposition of the matter?

Mr. MATSON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of no quorum withdrawn?

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not except on the condition expressed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot withdraw it on condition.

Mr. STEELE. I must renew it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. MATSON. I objected to consent that this bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation with the understanding it be voted on hereafter. I have no objection if the order be that this bill shall be voted on at some other time than an evening session.

Mr. McMILLIN. That will be inevitable.

Mr. MATSON. Otherwise when the Calendar is called it will come up as unfinished business, and no one paying attention it will pass as a matter of course.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is to be passed on in a full House.

Mr. CANNON. I accept that, as it is the best I can do.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

A. SCHUYLER SUTTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 5771) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to A. Schuyler Sutton," approved June 4, 1872.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act granting a pension to A. Schuyler Sutton," approved June 4, 1872, be and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of A. Schuyler Sutton, late acting lieutenant-colonel of the Ninety-fifth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $30 per month as pension, from the 22d day of December, 1862; and after deducting the amount which has actually been paid to him as pension, to pay the said A. Schuyler Sutton the balance found due him as provided by this act."

The amendment of the committtee was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "thirty dollars per month as pension from the 22d day of December, 1862; and after deducting the amount which has actually been paid him as pension, to pay he said A. Schuyler Sutton the balance found due him as provided by this act," and in lieu thereof insert "forty dollars per month, from and after the passage of this act."

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5771) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to A. Schuyler Sutton," approved June 4, 1872, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to make the following report:

At the breaking out of the civil war A. Schuyler Sutton, who had seen honorable service during the war with Mexico, was an attorney at law in successful practice at Norwalk, Ohio. He enlisted as a private soldier in the Ninety-fifth Ohio, and having acquired a knowledge of military tactics during his former service, greatly assisted in the organization, drill, and discipline of the new regiment.

There is satisfactory evidence that Sutton had received assurances from Governor Tod, of Ohio, that he should be commissioned as lieutenant-colonel of the regiment. It is certain that he was acting in that capacity, when, at the battle of Richmond, Kentucky, on or about August 30, 1862, he received the wound for which he was originally pensioned. Owing to the fact that he had not been commissioned the Pension Office rated him as a private soldier, and allowed him a pension at the rate of $8 per month, which was subsequently raised to $15. By an act of Congress, approved June 4, 1872, his pension was increased to $30 per month from that date.

Your committee believe that it would be an act of simple justice to this soldier to grant him a pension at this rate, dating from his discharge, deducting the amount received by him during the intervening period. His wound has had the effect of blasting his life. His jaws are so anchylosed as to prevent the mastication of solid food. The senses of sight and hearing are much impaired and he is a constant sufferer from violent facial neuralgia. Being unable to open his mouth sufficiently, and by reason of disorganization of the soft and bony tissues occasioned by the wound, he is unable to employ the ordinary means of cleanliness, and his breath is consequently horribly offensive.

In the opinion of your committee the evidence in the case justifies the conclusion to which it has arrived, "that the disability for which he is now pensioned existed at the time of his discharge." We therefore report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, so amended that said A. Schuyler Sutton be pensioned at the rate of $40 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN MOORE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 643) for the relief of Ellen Moore, widow of Allen Moore, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to inscribe upon the pension-rolls the name of Ellen Moore, widow of Allen Moore, deceased, of Company C, Palmetto Regiment, South Carolina Volunteers, Mexican war, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act at the rate of $8 per month.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 643) for the relief of Ellen Moore, widow of Allen Moore, would respectfully report that they have carefully examined the papers on which the Senate report in the same case is founded, and find the report fully sustained by the following facts:

There is no record of the enlistment of Allen Moore, and his name does not appear on the muster-roll of Company C, Captain Moffatt, Palmetto Regiment; but there is abundant proof adduced to show that he did serve in that company, and that he was mortally wounded at the battle of Churubusco, dying from his wounds in a few days after the fight. A synopsis of the testimony under oath establishing these facts is hereby submitted.

James Lacey, who was acting as body-servant to Lieutenant-Colonel Dickinson, Palmetto Regiment, testifies that he knew Moore for many years prior to the Mexican war; that he knew that he was a member of Captain Moffatt's company; that "he saw said Allen Moore just after the battle of Churubusco in a dying condition, the result of wounds received in that battle, and that in a day or two thereafter he saw the dead body of said Allen Moore, he having died from said wounds received by him while in the discharge of his duty as a member of said company and regiment." Stephen M. Boykin, lieutenant in Company A, Palmetto Regiment, swears that "there was a private in Captain Moffatt's company (C) of said regiment by the name of Moore." Benjamin F. Speay swears "that he was a member of Captain Moffatt's company, (C,) Palmetto Regiment, Mexican war; * * * that he knew Allen Moore, the husband of the above-named Ellen Moore; that he was a private in the same company with deponent; * * * he did not see Allen Moore after the battle of Churubusco, and the general report of his death in the line of his duty he has not a doubt is entirely true." Henry Mevely, a private in the regiment, testifies that he knew Allen Moore well, and knows that he was mustered into service in Captain Moffatt's company in Charleston; that he was wounded at Churubusco or Contreras, and that he never was with the regiment afterward.

Zachariah Cauley testifies "that he was a member of the Palmetto Regiment in the Mexican war, he having left home as a member of Captain Moffatt's company, and subsequently appointed color-sergeant of said regiment; that Allen Moore was a member of said company." Ransom L. Logan swears "that he was a member of Captain Moffatt's company, Palmetto Regiment; that Allen Moore, the husband of the above-named Ellen Moore, was a private in said company; * * * that deponent saw him as he was borne from the battle-field of Churubusco mortally wounded." James J. Villepigue, another member of Moffatt's company, testifies to the fact that Moore belonged to the same company. There were many other affidavits to the same general effect before the committee, and they are among the papers accompanying this report, but are not quoted, as the evidence given is deemed sufficient to prove Moore's service and death. Three affidavits have been lost or mislaid, among them one from John Graham, who saw Moore buried.

Joseph B. Kershaw, a lieutenant in the Palmetto Regiment, subsequently a major-general in the confederate service, and now one of the circuit judges of South Carolina, in his testimony, speaks of Moore "as a member of the Palmetto Regiment," and says that "he knew personally and well the men who made affidavit in support of said application; that they were and are men of the highest character and veracity, and as such entitled to full faith and credit, and that he has entire confidence in the merit and justice of said claim." The evidence submitted proves conclusively that Allen Moore served as a private in the Palmetto Regiment, and that he was killed at Churubusco. The only flaw in the claim of his widow for a pension arises from the fact that her husband's name has not been found on the muster-roll of his company; but this fact should not bar her just and equitable claim to the pittance earned by her husband's death. He gave his life to his country on one of its bloodiest and most glorious battle-fields, and she now, at the advanced age of seventy-five years, will be forced, should her petition be declined, to seek refuge in the poor-house of the county in which her husband left her when he volunteered to defend the honor of his country.

Wherefore your committee herewith report back the bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA F. PORTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 6624) granting an increase of pension to Eliza F. Porter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the rate of pension of Eliza F. Porter, widow of Lieutenant James E. Porter, late of the Seventh United States Cavalry, to $30 a month, in lieu of the pension she now receives.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4838) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Eliza F. Porter, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

It appears from the evidence on file with this committee that the applicant, Mrs. Eliza F. Porter, is the widow of First Lieutenant James E. Porter, of the Seventh United States Cavalry, who was killed in action June 25, 1876, while engaged with the Sioux Indians on Little Big Horn River, Montana Territory, (Custer massacre.)

The petitioner receives now the pension of a first lieutenant's widow, her only support, ($16 per month;) and she has a boy nine years of age to support, and is herself a confirmed invalid, unable to do anything. She is at present living with her father and mother in Auburn, Rhode Island, both of whom are hopeless invalids.

The battle in which Lieutenant Porter lost his life was one of the most heroic struggles that has ever cast luster on American arms. Every man was killed. Every man literally fought until he died, and died at the hands of merciless savages.

In consideration of the extraordinary circumstances attending this case the committee recommend that the pension be increased to $30 per month, and report herewith a substitute for bill H. R. No. 4838, which provides for an increase of pension as above stated.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AARON SNYDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1488) granting a pension to Aaron Snyder.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Aaron Snyder, late a private in Company A, Two hundred and second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, for disability resulting from disease incurred in the military service of the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No.

1488) granting a pension to Aaron Snyder, have considered the same, and adopt the report made in the Forty-sixth Congress, as follows:

"It appears from the evidence before the committee that the said Aaron Snyder was enlisted as a private in Company A, Two hundred and second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was discharged from said service on August 3, 1865.

"He filed his application for invalid pension the 27th March, 1877; alleges that in October, 1864, while in the service and line of his duty in the State of Virginia, he contracted rheumatism from exposure and fatigue, which settled in the os humerus of the left arm, which disease has been continuous since the first attack, and renders him incapable of performing manual labor; that he was treated in hospital at Alexandria, Virginia, and at Fairfax, Virginia.

"To support said allegations are the statements of Solomon and Edward Sittler, who state that they were well acquainted with Snyder before his enlistment; that they were his fellow-laborers before the late war, and to their personal knowledge he was a sound man when he was enrolled. Their statements are corroborated by Solome Morestein, who states further that after the return of Snyder from the Army he was suffering from pain and disease of his arm, and took remedies therefor, but without avail; that he lived with her from his discharge till 1866, and during that time he was unable to perform manual labor.

"Snyder, in an affidavit, states that he is unable to furnish a statement from the surgeon of his regiment, because he does not know the whereabouts of said surgeon.

"Stephen F. Minnic states that he was first lieutenant of Snyder's regiment and company, and affirms that he was diseased in the manner and at the time stated.

"Dr. E. P. Miller states that he has been a practicing physician for ten years; that he became acquainted with Snyder in September, 1866; found him suffering with 'exfoliation of left arm;' performed an operation upon him and treated him for said disease for some time afterward.

"Dr. C. F. Schreuer states that he is a practicing physician; that he treated claimant in 1869 for 'exfoliation of the os humerus of the left arm; that treatment consisted of an operation and cutting out the diseased bones and placing him under alteratives.'

"There is a letter in the papers from Dr. John T. Carpenter, who says Dr. Schreuer uses 'quack' remedies and is not of first-class standing in the profession.

"There is no report from the Surgeon-General's Office in regard to treatment in hospital at Fairfax, Virginia, but the report shows that Snyder was treated for intermittent fever at hospital at Alexandria, Virginia.

"The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim because there was no record-evidence of the fact that claimant contracted the disease resulting in the injuries in the service, or his treatment therefor in the service.

"It is the opinion of the committee that the petitioner has exhibited an equitable right to pension, and we recommend the passage of the bill accompanying this report."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PATRICK HORAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 6501) granting a pension to Patrick Horan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Patrick Horan, late a teamster in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, with the same rate of pension to which a private soldier would be entitled for like disabilities.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6501) granting a pension to Patrick Horan, having had the same under consideration, would submit the following report:

The petitioner, Patrick Horan, of Joliet, Illinois, was enrolled on or about September 15, 1861, as a teamster of the Quartermaster's Department, by Captain G. E. D. Diamond, at Saint Louis, Missouri. He was never discharged, but paid last at Fort Riley, Kansas, and sent back to Saint Louis on the 28th of November, 1866.

While serving as a teamster he was taken prisoner of war at the battle of Poisons Springs, and was confined at Camp Ford, Tyler, Texas, from about April, 1864, to about the middle of February, 1865. While a prisoner he was without shelter or covering of any kind, and in June, 1864, was exposed to a rain storm of fourteen days' duration. During his confinement he dug a hole in the ground, in which he slept. In consequence of his exposure and suffering he was stricken with paralysis, from which disease he has been suffering to the present time.

His statement as to his imprisonment, exposure, and incurrence of paralysis in rebel prisons is corroborated by the testimony of Henry B. Clark, himself an inmate of said prison, and by the testimony of John B. Arnold, of the Chicago Mercantile Battery.

The evidence also shows that prior to and on his arrival at said prison he was in sound health. The testimony of neighbors of Joliet, Illinois, shows that upon his return to Joliet after the war he was afflicted with paralysis, which has continued to the present time, making him completely unable to perform any physical labor.

Dr. W. Dougall, of Will County, Illinois, states that since 1874 petitioner has been under his treatment; that he has carefully studied his case; that he is suffering from "locomotor ataxia," caused by exposure and sleeping upon damp ground; that it gradually grows worse; is incurable, and will soon render him entirely helpless.

His claim was rejected by the Pension Office, on the ground that petitioner was not in the military service of the United States, and therefore does not come under the general provisions of the pension law; but the Pension Bureau is of the opinion that his claim is a meritorious one and should be allowed by "special act;" and that, if such special act is granted, the pension should commence from the date of its passage, at such rate as the claimant, upon examination, may be found to be entitled to.

Your committee are of opinion that the claimant is entitled to the relief he seeks, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that be passed over for the present.

Mr. CULLEN. I hope that course will not be taken in this instance. This man was in the Army, though only as a teamster. He was taken a prisoner as if he had carried a musket, and was treated in all respects as a prisoner of war. He was very cruelly treated, and that cruel treatment brought on disease from which he is now suffering and which will eventuate in a short time in his death.

I happen to know this old man, and he is poor, helpless, and decrepit. He can only barely move a little by leaning forward on two canes. I know the gentleman, Dr. Dougall, who testified to his condition, as one of the most experienced physicians and surgeons in that district of the country, and I know that his testimony is in every respect worthy of consideration. The man can live but a very short time; and if the Government is going to help him at all it will have to be done at once, or assistance will be of little service to him.

I appreciate the position taken by the gentleman from Tennessee, and sympathize with him in many of these cases; but this is an exceptional case, one that ought to be passed, and passed promptly, and I would not ask its favorable consideration if I was not thoroughly convinced of its merits and the propriety of passing the bill promptly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to laying this bill aside informally?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir; I object. I move that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chair decided by the sound the ayes had it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I must ask a division. I should do myself injustice were I to fail to take the same course with this case that I took with reference to the case presented and so ably argued by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] I am unwilling to let this bill stand upon higher ground than the case to which I now refer, and to which I felt compelled to object for the reasons that I have already stated, though I did it with hesitation and reluctance. But the principle that I have felt it my duty to be guided by in all of these other cases I must apply to this and to each one of them. I suggest, therefore, that the bill take the same course as that taken by the bill of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not object to its taking the same course as that bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. It cannot take any better course to-night.

Mr. CULLEN. If it cannot take any better course, then I must, I suppose, yield, and allow it to take that course.

Mr. McMILLIN. If we are to enter upon the civil list these questions ought to have a further hearing before a full House. Let it then be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, and with the understanding that a vote is to be taken in the House upon it.

A MEMBER. When a quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be laid aside and reported favorably to the House.

There was no objection.

LOIS L. WEEKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions was the bill (H. R. No. 5434) for the relief of the heirs of Lois L. Weeks.

Mr. BROWNE. That is an adverse report.

Mr. DINGLEY. With reference to this case, and by the consent of the members of the committee, I desire to make a brief statement.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the heirs of Lois L. Weeks, mother of Charles B. Weeks, late of Company C, Second Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, both deceased, the sum of $860, that being the amount of arrears of pension allowed to the said Lois L. Weeks by the Pension Department, as appears by her certificate numbered 175590, which allowance was not paid in consequence of her decease.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Let the report also be read in that case.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5434) for the relief of the heirs of Lois L. Weeks, has had the same under consideration, and begs leave to submit the following report:

It appears from the papers before this committee that Lois L. Weeks was pensioned as the dependent mother of Charles B. Weeks, who died in the service of the United States while serving as a private in Company C, Second New Hampshire Volunteers. She did not apply for pension for more than five years after the soldier's death, hence her pension was made to commence from the date of filing of the last essential evidence, June 6, 1872. Under the act of January 25, 1879, she became entitled to arrears for the period intervening between the date of the soldier's death and the original commencement of her pension, amounting to $860.27.

This allowance was made by the Pension Office September 15, 1879, and the necessary certificate was mailed to the pension agent on the 20th of said month. The pensioner died, however, September 12, 1879, or three days before the allowance of said arrears. There being no law under which any person could receive the accrued or unpaid pension of a dependent mother, except so much as may be necessary to reimburse the person who bore the expenses of the last sickness and burial of the decedent, in case where there are not sufficient assets left to meet such expenses, payment of the amount allowed by the arrears certificate was refused.

The bill under consideration proposes to give the unpaid arrears to the heirs of the deceased. The papers on file in the Pension Office show that the father of the soldier survives, and that he has a claim for pension now pending. That he will be able to establish the same can hardly be questioned, inasmuch as the dependence of the parents upon the soldier is fully shown in the mother's case, and it is hoped that relief be afforded him by an early adjudication of the claim.

But the relief asked from Congress, in the opinion of this committee, should be denied, as other claims for arrears, equally as meritorious, have been, by the action of both Houses; and therefore this committee reports adversely on the bill, and asks to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, there were some essential facts in connection with this case that were not before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and in fact were not known to myself at the time the committee took the case up for consideration. The first essential fact is that the father who did apply for a pension as being dependent upon the son, as stated in the report, died six months after the mother died, and so there could be no pension given to him on account of dependence on the son. The second essential fact is that the mother, dependent upon the son, died three days before the arrears of pension was allowed. During her last sickness, which continued for several years, she was cared for by a daughter and son, themselves under age, in ill health; and that daughter and son besides giving their whole time for the care of their invalid mother during these two or three years contracted debts amounting to something over $500 in consequence of her illness.

Now, the situation of the case is simply this: the heirs, consisting of a son and a daughter, themselves ill and unable to care for themselves, and made so to some extent by taking care of the mother, who was entitled to this pension, contracted debts as I have said amounting to some $500, besides giving their own time for two years to her care. If the mother had died three days later they would have received the $860 of arrears; but as the mother died three days before the pension was allowed under the law as it stands, strictly they are not entitled to receive this amount, notwithstanding that they contracted these bills in caring for her, and notwithstanding also that they gave their time for two years in caring for the mother. To-day these children, bed-ridden one of them and the other ill, are objects of charity in the town in which they reside in my district.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, that, under these circumstances, it is but just and proper that the $800 which would have belonged to the mother and would have passed to the dependent children at her death ought now to come to the children and not to be retained by the Government.

I feel it my duty to make this statement of the facts of the case to the committee, and ask that, in justice to the family and in justice to the memory of this soldier, this amount be allowed and paid over to the helpless children. I move, then, in order to test the judgment of the committee upon the matter, that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman the circumstances as presented by the gentleman from Maine are certainly such as to excite our sympathies; but, at the same time, I fear we would be establishing a precedent here that would open up a great number of cases where heirs under like circumstances have been deprived of pensions to which they would have been entitled if the pensioner had lived but a few days longer. I know a number of cases where death has occurred and the heirs have been in the most distressed circumstances, and yet they have only been allowed under the law the expenses of the last illness and the funeral expenses.

If we do it in this case we ought to go back and do it in all these other cases where heirs have been deprived of pensions.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to say that the last illness of this lady lasted for three years, and debts were contracted during this time which would far exceed this amount of $860.

Mr. HENDERSON. But the point I wish to make is, that these heirs must rest under the same general law as all other heirs rest under; because otherwise, if we do what is asked to be done in this case, I know there are many other cases where we would be asked under the circumstances to do it, and where the pensions have not been allowed heretofore. I think we cannot afford to do that.

Mr. BROWNE. The Committee on Invalid Pensions is a little unfortunate. Its adverse reports seem to be generally overruled by the Committee of the Whole when they come to be considered; and for that reason I feel a delicacy even in attempting to defend the action of the committee.

What are the facts in this case? The deceased, to whom the pension certificate was granted, was a dependent mother. She was entitled to a pension because of the death of her son in the military service. The pension law makes it purely a personal matter. It goes to support the mother and no other person. The pension law exempts the pension from the payment of the debts of the beneficiary. She might, had she received the money, have applied it to the payment of these debts or she might have refused to have done so. The matter was one optional to herself. It was not subject to execution or attachment or any legal process for payment of a debt. The object of the law is to give a pension for the support of a living person, and therefore when the person dies there is no beneficiary; there ought to be none.

The very purpose of the law is defeated if you permit a pension that is intended to support a living person to go to the heirs of that person after the decease of the person for whose benefit the law was passed. I would not mind it in this case. It is a case that appeals very strongly to the sympathy of every person who has heard the statement of the gentleman from Maine. But these cases are innumerable; and if we go back and allow pensions that have accrued in behalf of deceased persons that have not been allowed during their lifetime, or where the pensions have been granted subsequent to their death, which is equivalent to no allowance—if we open the door in that way, millions upon millions will go out of the Treasury of the United States. And there is not any reason why it should be so.

In the case of minors, when they have reached the age of sixteen, they are not entitled to a pension; and if they have a legal claim pending that is not allowed until they reach that age, it lapses. And it ought to lapse. They are no longer regarded as dependent. The law assumes they have arrived at such an age as enables them to take care of themselves. So when a pension is granted, or when a pension is due a widow, if she marries the pension ceases. Why? Because she is no longer dependent, having entered into new matrimonial relations.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BROWNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would remind the gentleman that this is for arrears. The Government admits it was indebted to Lois L. Weeks from some time in 1878. Now, shall the Government take advantage of this bill in settling what is admitted to be due to Lois L. Weeks because she died three days before the final settlement and refuse to pay the amount that has been due her and which was expended during that time for her support? It seems to me the case is a little different from the one stated by the gentleman.

Mr. BROWNE. I answer the question by referring to this very case. The report itself shows that under the law Lois L. Weeks was denied a pension covering about five years. Why? Because the claim was not filed within the limitation. The Government owed this pension as much during those five years as it did subsequently. But the Government itself fixes the statute of limitations, and says that prior to the time when the last proof is filed that is necessary to establish the case it will grant no pension.

Now, how is the law as to what occurred subsequently? I answer the gentleman in this way: let us suppose that instead of the pension having been granted three days after her death the application had not been made until three days after her death. Why, the Government owed it as much, if the gentleman insists this is in the nature of a debt, as if the application had been made before her death. But the Government says, "We are under no obligations to support people who are dead; they do not need any support." The consequence is that the pension that may have been due the living person lapses at the death of that person. It is just as an action at law for tort which is a personal right; it dies with the plaintiff or with the claim.

In this case the death of the dependent mother occurred before the pension certificate was granted. The certificate was a nullity and the action of the Commissioner was the same as in all cases of that kind. In all these cases the law says that all that shall go to the surviving heirs or personal representatives of the deceased is the necessary expenses of the last sickness and burial; and it only grants this in the event that the estate of the deceased is not sufficient to pay those expenses. I care little about this individual case; but I say to the gentleman from Maine, and I say to the committee that there are thousands of these cases, and if the Committee of the Whole desire to establish this precedent, why the Committee on Invalid Pensions must be content. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. DINGLEY,] that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will accordingly be laid aside to be reported to the House with an unfavorable recommendation.

ALVIN WALKER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 3717) granting a pension to Alvin Walker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alvin Walker, with the rank of major and paymaster.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "with the rank of major and paymaster."

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3717) granting a pension to Alvin Walker, respectfully reports:

That a similar bill was favorably reported upon during the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress. The report then made, substantially as follows, is adopted by this committee:

The papers in the case show that the petitioner was appointed additional paymaster, United States Army, September 10, 1861, and discharged May 29, 1865, and that his application for pension was filed August 29, 1876, alleging "that in June and July, 1863, he contracted typhoid fever, and from the effects of said fever and exposure his eyes became affected; that from said time his sight began to fail, that he is disabled by disease of eyes, and that without strong glasses he is unable to distinguish any but large objects, and even with the strongest glasses he is unable to do any work."

The Pension Office rejected the claim December 26, 1877, upon the ground "the disease of eyes found by the board not shown to be a sequel or result of typhoid fever."

The petitioner was near-sighted so as to require the use of glasses before entering the service, but had never had diseased eyes, and was until the summer of 1863 a sound and healthy man. He was then aged about thirty-nine years.

Assistant Surgeon R. O. Sidney testifies to soundness before enlistment.

George Beakley, M. D., testifies, (21st January, 1878)—

"That from the year 1853 to the 10th day of September, 1861, he attended and prescribed for said Alvin Walker, as his physician and medical adviser, in the city of New York, where deponent then resided; that said Alvin Walker between the above-named dates had no disease which affected his eyes, or either of them, but that his eyes were perfectly healthy and sound, and free from any tendency to disease or weakness, as deponent verily believes."

Captain J. B. Mix, on staff of General Martindale, in command District of Columbia, says that about July, 1863, claimant was sick for a considerable time with typhoid fever.

Colonel J. B. Swain, of Scott's Nine Hundred, corroborates Captain Mix.

Assistant Surgeon R. O. Sidney testifies—

"That claimant contracted typhoid fever from exposure while on duty in the District of Columbia; that at that time affiant was stationed at Camp Relief as surgeon in charge, and during said time claimant consulted him as to the condition of his eyesight, and the fact that his eyesight was beginning to fail. Affiant on examination found him suffering with ophthalmia, and it was with difficulty that he could perform his duties."

Dr. George Beakley (claimant's family physician) testifies at another time, January 6, 1877, that claimant's eyes at date of discharge were diseased from the effects of typhoid fever, and that he has treated him more or less from that date to the present time.

Claimant himself swears that he was treated by a physician in private practice for the typhoid fever, whose name he does not now recollect; has heard he was dead.

The Adjutant-General's reports show that Major Walker was on duty in Washington in May, 1863, and was detached for temporary duty at New York City June 12, 1863, to return about 1st of July. July 18, 1863, he was ordered from Washington to New York on temporary duty; he reported at Washington, from temporary duty at New York, August 12, 1863. The records of the office show no evidence of disability in case of Major Walker.

The Surgeon-General's Office, in report of the case: "The records of attending surgeons of volunteer officers, Washington, District of Columbia, show no information in this case."

The claimant was examined by the board of examining surgeons of the Pension Office at New York City, February 21, 1877, for disability from "impaired vision," who rated him one-half, ($12.50,) and found him affected "by ophthalmoscope, with final atrophy of both optic nerves. Both eyes are cataractous."

The Pension Office placed the case in the hands of a special agent of the office for investigation December, 1877, and the evidence returned is generally favorable to the claimant.

This committee is of the opinion that the claimant was near-sighted before his sickness, but that his eyes were not diseased until such sickness, and that they became and remain diseased in consequence of such sickness, and the same is a disability incurred by the petitioner while in the service and in the line of his duty.

The passage of the bill is therefore recommended, amended by striking out the last seven words of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZA H. RAMSAY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 6681) granting a pension to Eliza H. Ramsay.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Eliza H. Ramsay, widow of Brigadier-General George D. Ramsay, brevet major-general United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 a month.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6681) granting a pension to Eliza H. Ramsay, having carefully examined the same, submit the following report:

The applicant is the widow of the late Brigadier-General George D. Ramsay, brevet major-general United States Army, who died at Washington, District of Columbia, on the 23d day of May, 1882.

General Ramsay, at the time of his death, had served the Government longer than any living officer of the Army, having entered the Military Academy August 29, 1814. His service was as honorable as it was long. He passed through all the successive grades of rank until he was appointed brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, in which capacity his services were of exceeding value during the war of the rebellion. He was noted for his inflexible integrity in the discharge of his duties, and died leaving no estate whatever, and a widow and three daughters who had been dependent on him.

Mrs. Ramsay is left without income for her maintenance, or any resource from which she can obtain one, and is so physically disabled as to be helpless.

It has been customary in similar cases to allow special pensions, and the exceptionally long and valuable services of General Ramsay and the absolute necessity of this pension for the support of his widow make it eminently just that the custom should be followed in this case.

We report the bill back and recommend its passage.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have the chairman of the Pensions Committee inform the Committee of the Whole under what law this pension is to be granted. It does not appear that this officer was disabled in the service.

Mr. BROWNE. It will be granted under the law which will be passed by this Congress if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. STEELE. There are numerous precedents for this case. There are now some sixty-eight widows drawing pensions whose husbands held no higher rank than the husband of this widow. This officer served longer than other officer in the Army. His widow is now bed-ridden, unable to take care of herself. The other night we passed a bill here granting a pension to a lady who is at least physically able to take care of herself. We have sixty-eight or seventy precedents for this case. This bill comes from the Committee on Pensions, and not from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BROWNE. I beg the pardon of my colleague, [Mr. STEELE.] I supposed that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] referred to me when he asked his question, and that was the reason I made answer to him.

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply desire to call attention to what is proposed by this bill, and also to what the committee, by an almost unanimous vote, decided a few minutes ago we could not do in the case which we then acted upon. It is not claimed that this officer was disabled in the service, and therefore there can be no legal claim for a pension in this case.

Mr. STEELE. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is claimed that he was worn out in the service.

Mr. DINGLEY. The other case which we have just acted upon unfavorably is a case where an amount had actually been allowed to a dependent mother, where debts had been incurred for her support, and where the two children that are left are objects of charity and supported by contributions from their neighbors.

Now, I do not dispute at all the propriety of the position which the Committee on Pensions take upon this case. But if this House is to be just, we cannot certainly refuse to give a pension to two poor bed-ridden children, the brother and sister of a soldier who died in the service, children who are now objects of charity.

If we grant a pension in this case, where there is no pretense that there was any disability incurred by the officer while in service, and no legal claim on the part of any one to a pension, then we will be doing an act of pure mercy in granting a pension which cannot be legally claimed under any law. Now, if we are going to exercise mercy in this case, it seems to me that we ought to go back and exercise it in a case immensely more deserving than this is.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Does the report in this case show the age of this lady?

Mr. STEELE. The report does not show it. I can inform the gentleman that she is a very old lady.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that she is nearly eighty years of age.

Mr. STEELE. She is from seventy-eight to eighty years of age.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not going to make any objection in this case. I simply want to call attention to the action of the Committee of the Whole in different cases; giving a stone to one and bread to the other.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LYDIA S. ROARK.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I desire to call attention to a case, on page 46 of the Calendar, which was passed over informally this evening. It is the bill (H. R. No. 1576) granting a pension and bounty to Lydia S. Roark.

The CHAIRMAN. That case was passed over because there was no report here.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I made the report in the case, as will be seen by reference to the Calendar, on June 9, and the report was printed. I have a copy of it at my room, and supposed that it was here. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MATSON,] will recollect it.

The person named in that bill, Lydia S. Roark, was the infant daughter of a soldier who enlisted and was sworn into the service. He went into battle at Rogersville, Tennessee, as shown by the papers from the Pension Office, on the 2d of October, 1863, and lost his life in that battle. Because of the fact that the regiment had never been mustered in, although they went into battle, because of the fact that the whole regiment was there captured and the rolls were lost, it became necessary to make up new rolls of the regiment.

There was no record in the Pension Office or the Adjutant-General's office showing that he had ever been mustered; still the proof to that effect was overwhelming.

Mr. PRESCOTT. The bill itself as read was objectionable, and that was the reason it was passed over. I ask that the bill be read again.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Lydia S. Roark, minor child of Alvin Roark, late a private in Company B, Second Regiment of Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, on the roll of pensioners, and pay her, if she is of lawful age, but if not, to her legally-appointed guardian, out of the military pension fund, a pension of $8 per month commencing on the 6th day of November, 1863, with increase of $2 per month commencing on the 25th day of July, 1866, and to continue up to the time she arrived at sixteen years of age.

SEC. 2. That the Paymaster-General of the United States Army be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money appropriated, or hereafter to be appropriated, for the payment of the Army, to Lydia S. Roark, minor child of Alvin Roark, late a private in Company B, Second Regiment of Tennessee Volunteers, if she is of lawful age, but if not, to her legally-appointed guardian, $192, for twelve months' service of said soldier in said regiment, together with the regular bounty due said soldier, and also the additional bounty under act of July 28, 1866.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I have sent to the document-room for the report in this case; and the answer is that it is not there. The bill is a very singular one; and it is very doubtful whether it ever passed the committee in its present form. Without the report we are unable to tell what the committee did in regard to it. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BROWNE. When this bill was up before I did not remember the circumstances; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] was doubtless correct in concluding from my remarks that the committee had not considered the bill in its present shape. But I now remember the case distinctly. The bill was considered by the committee, and considered in the shape in which it now is.

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is the fact.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me that there is a strong objection to the bill because it proposes to grant arrears of pension, when, as I understand, the uniform practice of the House has been not to grant arrears in any case where the pension was granted under a special act.

Mr. PETTIBONE. As members of the committee will recollect, it appeared in this case that very soon after the war an application for a pension was made. The case has been pending all these years. As the beneficiary in the case is an orphan—a little girl—and her guardian had done everything he could toward procuring the pension, and was met by the technical objection founded on the fact that the records had been captured in battle and the soldier killed before muster, the committee resolved that the bill ought to pass in its present shape.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to amend by striking out the second section.

Mr. HENDERSON. Where we have granted pensions by special acts the uniform rule, I submit, has been not to allow arrears. I know that the Senate has in many cases amended in this respect the bills which we have passed.

Mr. RAY. I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] is a little mistaken in the statement he has just made. Where the party is clearly entitled to a pension, but, as in this case, through the destruction of evidence has been unable to establish the claim until the records have been corrected, I think the precedents are—there have been one or two since I have been a member of the House—to allow a minor the pension up to the time when he attains the age of sixteen years.

Mr. PEELLE. But the gentleman from Tennessee states that this man was mustered before the loss of the roll.

Mr. PETTIBONE. The difficulty was that he volunteered, went right into battle, and lost his life.

Mr. STEELE. The motion is made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] to strike out the second section. If that be agreed to, it will obviate the objection now raised.

Mr. RAY. I ask that the second section be again read.

The Clerk again read the second section.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ALDRICH, to strike out the second section, it was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER. It would be very hard indeed if, when the father of this minor child served for nearly a year, no one is to be paid for his service.

Mr. PRESCOTT. He did not serve for a year.

Mr. PARKER. For seven or eight months.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I understood that he was killed almost immediately upon entering the service.

Mr. PARKER. No; this was in a part of the country where soldiers were not mustered until after they had fought a good while. I understand that he served nearly a year—more than half a year. Now it seems to me very unjust to strike from this bill the provision for paying to the child the actual earnings of the father who was killed in battle.

Mr. ALDRICH. This is simply a claim—not a pension case at all. I submit to the Chair that the bill does not come within the order of the House in reference to this evening's session.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to raise the question of order after the discussion has proceeded on a bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I insist it be laid over.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to its being passed over informally? The Chair thinks there must be some misunderstanding. The gentleman from Illinois moved to strike out the second section. That was submitted to the committee and declared to be carried.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is moved as amended that it be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. PETTIBONE. That carries the pension?

Mr. ALDRICH. That carries the pension.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. That is all right.

As amended, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ESTHER M. CAREY.

Mr. LEEDOM. I move by unanimous consent to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Esther M. Carey.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Esther M. Carey, mother of William B. Carey, deceased, late a private in Company H, Twelfth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, war of 1861.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LA FAYETTE AXTELL.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to take up the bill (H. R. No. 3714) to increase the pension of Lafayette Axtell. It is the first time I ever asked for such a favor. The case is extraordinary in its character. He had the side of his face carried away.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of La Fayette Axtell, late of Company A, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, at the rate of $24 per month, to commence from the passage of this act, and to be in lieu of the pension heretofore granted to La Fayette Axtell under the provisions of the general pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA ATKINS MERCHANT.

Mr. STONE. I ask to take up the bill (H. R. No. 6638) granting a pension to Eliza Atkins Merchant.

There was no objection, and the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Atkins Merchant, widow of the late Captain Charles G. Merchant, of the United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $30 a month, in lieu of the pension she now receives.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the House bill No. 6638, granting a pension to Eliza Atkins Merchant, have considered the same, and report:

Mrs. Eliza Atkins Merchant is the widow of Captain Charles G. Merchant, who was an officer in the United States Army and was promoted for gallant and meritorious conduct in the Mexican war.

Subsequently in a fight with the Indians on the Mexican frontier he was severely wounded by a rifle-ball in the neck, from which he never recovered.

His widow is a lady of delicate health, who is dependent on her mother for support.

In consideration of the premises the committee think the pension should be increased, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS WILSON.

Mr. BROWNE. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to offer a formal amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4092) to increase the pension of Thomas Wilson, which was laid aside a few moments since to be reported to the House. I am informed that the name of this pensioner is Thomas E. Wilson, and I desire that the bill and the title be corrected by inserting the initial letter E. in the bill where it properly occurs.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be agreed to, and the title of the bill changed to correspond.

There was no objection.

CONDEMNED CANNON, MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if it be in order I ask to take up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 2057) granting condemned cannon, &c., to the city of Marshalltown, Iowa, and ask its present consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa if this bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. It is on the Speaker's table. It will be found on page 67 of the Calendar——

Mr. BROWNE. That bill is not before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be taken from the Speaker's table at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Then when the House resumes its session I shall ask to take it up.

AARON SHERIDAN.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask to take from the Private Calendar the bill (H. R. No. 1976) granting a pension to the minor children of Aaron Sheridan, deceased, and put it upon its passage. Inasmuch as this is probably the last evening session we shall have for the consideration of pension bills, I desire that action be taken on this bill to-night if possible. It will be found on page 34 of the Calendar, and has been already considered once or twice by the committee, but the point was made that no quorum was present, and its passage defeated. It is reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with favorable recommendation with amendments, and has been pending since February 24.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill has been passed over informally at several meetings, and was passed over informally by unanimous consent to-night. It can only be taken up now by unanimous consent.

Mr. RAY. Then I ask unanimous consent to have it taken up, and that it be allowed to take the same course with the other bills to which similar objection was made; that is, that it be favorably recommended to the House, but that no vote be taken upon it except in the presence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of Levi F. Sheridan, George H. Sheridan, James Edward Sheridan, Alfred A. Sheridan, and Charles A. Sheridan, minor children of Aaron Sheridan, late light-house keeper on Manitou Island, in Northern Lake Michigan, and who was drowned by the capsizing of the Government boat while carrying papers and the United States mails from the mainland to the island, a distance of twelve miles, on or about the —— day of March, 1878, at the rate of $8 per month each while they are under sixteen years of age.

Mr. RAY. This bill is reported with amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Fill the blank in the twelfth line by inserting the word "fifteen."

2. Strike out all after the words "eighteen hundred seventy-eight," in the thirteenth line.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PRESCOTT. The request of the gentleman from New Hampshire was that it be reported favorably to the House, but not to be voted upon except when a quorum is present.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right; not to be considered without a quorum.

Mr. RAY. That is the request I make.

Mr. BROWNE. It is now within five minutes of eleven o'clock——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana rise to oppose the bill?

Mr. BROWNE. I move that the committee do now rise; but pending that motion I desire to say that this bill has provoked in previous sessions of the House a good deal of discussion. Gentlemen on the committee who have been present on previous evenings know its character. I do not care about entering into a discussion of the merits of the bill at this time. The Committee on Invalid Pensions was divided upon the question of the propriety of making a favorable report upon it; and I know that some of the members of the committee, who are perhaps not present to-night, are very decidedly opposed to entering upon its consideration. It cannot pass to-night except in the presence of a quorum, and therefore I think the committee had better rise.

Mr. RAY. I simply ask that it be allowed to take the same course with other bills of like character to which objection was made. The bill has a favorable recommendation from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I hope it will be allowed to come before the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BROWNE. I am entirely willing that it shall come into the House with a favorable recommendation from the Committee of the Whole, but with the distinct understanding that it is not to be considered at a night session.

Mr. RAY. That is all right, I have no objection to that.

Mr. BROWNE. And the reason why I state this so positively is that on a former occasion we sent one of these bills into the House under these circumstances, supposing it was to be determined only by a quorum; but in some mysterious way it came back at a night session and was passed, so that our objection in that case was of no avail. With that understanding, however, I am willing to let this bill go to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that will be done.

Mr. RAY. There is no objection whatever to that course.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE. I now renew the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. BRIGGS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration bills reported from the Committees on Pensions and Invalid Pensions, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with various recommendations.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that after what has been said the Clerk will not read for the consideration of the House to-night those bills that have been recommended favorably by the Committee of the Whole with the understanding that they should be considered only when a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will observe the instructions of the Committee of the Whole in that respect.

BILLS PASSED.

The following House bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with favorable recommendations, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4562) for the relief of Julia A. Stimers;
A bill (H. R. No. 5725) granting a pension to D. F. Bashares;
A bill (H. R. No. 6400) granting a pension to Mrs. Orpah Meacham;
A bill (H. R. No. 3322) for the relief of Susan Shearer;
A bill (H. R. No. 5558) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Bayard;
A bill (H. R. No. 6411) granting a pension to Catharine Stover;
A bill (H. R. No. 6412) granting a pension to Cynthia Martin;
A bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of Alice J. Bennit;
A bill (H. R. No. 5312) granting a pension to Margaret G. Halpine;
A bill (H. R. No. 6422) granting a pension to Henry S. Woodward;
A bill (H. R. No. 2285) to increase the pension of James H. McNutt;
A bill (H. R. No. 1011) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. George;
A bill (H. R. No. 6521) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline A. Turner;
A bill (H. R. No. 5906) granting a pension to Harriet N. Abbott;
A bill (H. R. No. 6522) granting an increase of pension to Jerome B. Adams;
A bill (H. R. No. 6523) for the relief of N. C. Ridenour;
A bill (H. R. No. 6524) granting a pension to George C. Rust;
A bill (H. R. No. 5299) granting an increase of pension to John Dwyer;
A bill (H. R. No. 1989) granting a pension to Mary A. Sanders;
A bill (H. R. No. 6624) granting an increase of pension to Eliza F. Porter;
A bill (H. R. No. 1488) granting a pension to Aaron Snyder;
A bill (H. R. No. 6681) granting a pension to Eliza H. Ramsay;
A bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Esther M. Carey;
A bill (H. R. No. 3714) to increase the pension of Lafayette Axtell; and A bill (H. R. No. 6638) granting a pension to Eliza Atkins Merchant.

The bill (H. R. No. 2504) to increase the pension of Abram Colley was reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. No. 4092) to increase the pension of Thomas Wilson, was reported by the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROWNE, the title of the bill was amended by inserting "E." between "Thomas" and "Wilson," so as amended to read, "to increase the pension of Thomas E. Wilson."

The bill (H. R. No. 5771) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to A. Schuyler Sutton," approved June 4, 1872, was reported by the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. No. 3717) granting a pension to Alvin Walker was reported by the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. No. 1576) granting a pension and bounty to Lydia S. Roark was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended by striking out the words "and bounty."

The following Senate bills were reported by the Committee of the Whole House with favorable recommendations; and they were severally ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. No. 718) granting a pension to Ellen M. Godfrey;
A bill (S. No. 1195) granting a pension to William Hazelit;
A bill (S. No. 219) for the relief of Rebecca Wright;
A bill (S. No. 1532) granting a pension to George C. Quick;
A bill (S. No. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Florida G. Casey;
A bill (S. No. 462) granting a pension to Emma A. Ramsey;
A bill (S. No. 603) granting a pension to Sarah C. Golderman;
A bill (S. No. 725) granting a pension to S. Annie Esterbrook;
A bill (S. No. 1576) granting a pension to Ellen Lardner;
A bill (S. No. 144) granting a pension Mary E. Ambrester;
A bill (S. No. 802) granting a pension to Mrs. Cornelia F. White; and
A bill (S. No. 643) for the relief of Ellen Moore, widow of Allen Moore, deceased.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. BROWNE moved to reconsider the several votes by which the above bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

The following bills were reported from the Committee of the Whole House with adverse recommendations; and they were severally laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 5763) granting a pension to Aaron Buchanan;
A bill (S. No. 163) granting a pension to Hiram Johnson; and A bill (H. R. No. 5434) for the relief of the heirs of Lois L. Weeks.

BILLS POSTPONED.

The following bills were reported by the Committee of the Whole House with favorable recommendations, but not to be passed without the presence of a quorum:

A bill (H. R. No. 4982) granting a pension to Frederick Nelson, T. Caine, and Henry C. Sanders;
A bill (H. R. No. 6226) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Robb;
A bill (H. R. No. 6501) granting a pension to Patrick Horan; and
A bill (H. R. No. 1976) granting a pension to the minor children of Aaron Sheridan, deceased.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCOID. I ask consent to introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I ask to call up Senate bill No. 2057.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before that is done, I desire to make two reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which I could not make before, as I was not here.

There was no objection.

MARY E. RYAN.

Mr. McMILLIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 703) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Ryan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES J. WARNER.

Mr. McMILLIN also, from the same committee, reported back with an amendment with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1631) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Samuel J. Warner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. McCOID. I ask consent to submit for consideration at this time a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer to "Typ" Best post No. 75, Grand Army of the Republic, of Montrose, Iowa, one piece of condemned cast-iron cannon (and cannon balls) or field-piece for monumental purposes.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is that reported from any committee?

Mr. McCOID. It is not; but the Committee on Military Affairs have examined the bill and are favorable to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Make it "cast-iron" condemned cannon.

Mr. McCOID. I will do so.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the joint resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, to "Typ" Best Post No. 75, Grand Army of the Republic, one condemned cast-iron cannon and cannon balls or field-piece for monumental purposes.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 254) was received, read three several times, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I now ask to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 2057, granting condemned cannon, &c., to the city of Marshalltown, Iowa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will be compelled to hold to the ruling which the Chair made at the beginning of this evening's session.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Allow me a moment to call attention to the order of the House for this evening session. I think I am violating no confidence when I state that all the members I have conversed with agree with me in the construction which I desire to place on that rule or order of the House—

That until the further order of the House, on Friday of each week, the House shall take a recess at 4.30 o'clock until 7.30 o'clock—

That was changed so as to provide for a recess from five to eight o'clock—at which evening session bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions only shall be considered.

That was afterward amended, on motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE,] so as to "include the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon, not to interfere with the bills above named."

I think the construction which the Chair has placed upon that order is entirely too narrow, and will defeat the very object of the order. These bills donating condemned cannon are never reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions or the Committee on Pensions. Therefore the modification of the order made on motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] cannot apply to reports from those committees.

It does not matter where the bills come from, whether they are upon the Speaker's table or upon the Calendar. I think a liberal and fair construction of this order will include each and every one of these bills granting condemned cannon, and any other construction would certainly defeat the very object of the order. It is a mere matter of form, and I ask that the bill be now taken up and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to adhere to his former opinion on that subject. The gentleman will observe that in the first part of the order business during the evening sessions on Friday was restricted to "bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions and Pensions." That order was afterward amended so as to include the consideration of bills granting condemned cannon. The Chair thinks that a fair construction of the order is, that those bills must have been reported from a committee of the House and put on the Calendar. Now, the bill to which the gentleman alludes is not on the Calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. And it can never come from a committee and be placed on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair regrets to be compelled to adhere to his ruling, but he thinks that it is a fair construction of the order of the House. The Chair hopes that the gentleman will appeal from the decision, and let the House determine the question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Allow me to say that the modification contained in the last part of the order clearly indicates that before that modification no permission was given to take a bill from the Speaker's table, and the modification itself only allows certain bills to be taken from the Speaker's table, and does not include bills granting condemned cannon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair alluded to that in his former ruling.

Mr. DAWES. And these bills granting condemned cannon never go on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes the gentleman will appeal.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. If the Chair does not feel any delicacy in the matter, I do appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to understand the status of the gentleman's bill before I vote on this appeal.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. The bill has passed the Senate, and is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I think it is in order under the rule.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

The motion of Mr. SHALLENBERGER was agreed to; there being—ayes 8, noes 7.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to make an inquiry. I suppose it would be clearly in order for me to ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 6453, but the query is, Could I then move to substitute a Senate bill for it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to call up from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill (H. R. No. 6525) donating two mortars and four cast-iron balls to the post of the Grand Army of the Republic at Peru, Indiana.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the post of the Grand Army of the Republic at Peru, Indiana, two condemned (and obsolete) mortars and beds and four cast-iron balls, for the purpose of decorating the soldiers' cemetery at that city.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to move an amendment to the bill to make a donation of cannon and balls to the post of the Grand Army of the Republic at Clarinda, Iowa.

Mr. STEELE. If the bill is to be amended, I wish to move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] will first be entertained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to deliver to General Harrison Post of the Grand Army of the Republic at Kokomo, Indiana, two condemned (and obsolete) mortars and beds and four cast-iron balls, for the decoration of the soldiers' cemetery at that city."

The amendment of Mr. STEELE was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. I now move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"One condemned cast-iron cannon and carriage to the post of the Grand Army at Clarinda, Iowa."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCOID. I move to amend by adding to the bill the following:

Also two condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the post of the Grand Army of the Republic at Keosauqua, Iowa, for monumental purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCOID moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOREY. I move to amend by adding to the bill the following:

To the Ladies' Monumental Association of Mount Vernon, Ohio, four condemned cannon and four cannon-balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 4, noes 10.

Mr. STONE. I move to amend the bill by adding the following:

Four condemned cast-iron cannon to the Charles Sumner Grand Army Post of Groveland, Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I move to amend by adding the following:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to give to Post 183 of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Rochester, Pennsylvania, four condemned cast-iron and four cannon-balls for monumental purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill donating condemned cast-iron cannon and cannon-balls for monumental purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

SAMUEL J. WARNER.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to call up a bill to restore a soldier to the pension-roll who has been off the roll for more than twenty years after having been on it for ten years. I think every member who recollects the case, which was somewhat discussed in Committee of the Whole, will concur in the correctness of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 1631) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Samuel J. Warner was taken up, the amendment concurred in, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PEELLE. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eleven o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. S. S. COX: Papers relating to the claim of Augustus P. Green, for reimbursement for expenses incurred in recruiting, &c., in 1861—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: The petition of the board of health of Philadelphia, for an additional appropriation for the National Board of Health—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. FISHER: Papers relating to the claim of Joseph Beers—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HENDERSON: The petition of citizens of Rock Island, Illinois, protesting against the passage of the bill to establish tolls on the Government bridge at that place—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WARD: The resolution adopted by the Philadelphia (Pennsylvania) board of health, for an appropriation for continuing the publication of the Bulletin of the National Board of Health—to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 8, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF DUTIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I present certain amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation. I ask to have them printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS. Let them be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following sections to the bill:

SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, so much of section 3 of an act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government" as imposes an additional duty of 25 per cent. on all molasses, tank-bottoms, sirup of sugar-cane juice, melada, and on sugars according to the Dutch standard in color, imported from foreign countries, is hereby repealed, and the duties on such articles shall be and remain the same as before the passage of said act. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause proper Dutch standards of sugar to be furnished for use in the collection of duties on sugar, and to cause the saccharine strength of such standards to be ascertained, and when so ascertained to declare by regulation the true saccharine strength which shall be equivalent to each number of such standard. And in any case where the strength of the imported sugar is, in proportion to its color, above the proper strength for that color by the Dutch standard, duties shall be charged according to the strength, and not according to the color.

SEC. 5. That section 2504, title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, be amended by adding to schedule E of said title the following:

"That on and after the 1st day of October, 1882, the duty on steel railway bars and railway bars made in part of steel shall be $20 per ton; and that on all manufactures, articles, vessels, and wares made from hoop, band, or scroll iron, or of which hoop, band, or scroll iron shall be the component material of chief value, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the same duty, or rate of duty, as that imposed on the hoop, band, or scroll iron from which they are made, or which shall be the component material of chief value."

SEC. 6. That the reduction of duties provided for by this act shall also apply to all goods, wares, and merchandise on deposit in warehouses or public stores on the 1st day of October, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK subsequently said: I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation. The Committee on Finance reported back the bill with amendments, and the caucus has reported several other amendments this morning. I desire to offer still further amendments, of which this is one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish to have the amendment lie on the table?

Mr. BECK. I desire it to go with the caucus amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN. Is that amendment from the Senator's caucus?

Mr. BECK. No, my amendment did not come from the caucus. We heard so much about the caucus from the Senator from Vermont and the late Senator from New York last year that I propose to read a few of their speeches next Monday morning on the subject.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of maimed soldiers of Newark, New Jersey, praying for the passage of the bill increasing the pension to soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm or a leg, or suffered equivalent disability thereto, in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented the petition of John C. Robinson, of New York, praying to have changed a certain location of land made by him; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of the trustees of the Church Orphanage Association of Saint John's Church, Washington, District of Columbia, praying for an appropriation of $6,000 for its support, to recommend the following amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill:

For support of the Church Orphanage Association of Saint John's Church, of Washington, District of Columbia, the sum of $6,000.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommend the adoption of the amendment by the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to state in connection with the petition which was referred to the District Committee that the original has been mislaid, either through my negligence or the negligence of the clerk of the committee, perhaps mine, and the petition which accompanies the amendment is a duplicate of it. I think that statement necessary to explain the matter to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report some amendments which that committee proposes to the bill (S. No. 2107) to provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon the United States in places out of their territory and dominion, and to repeal the Revised Statutes from section 4082 to section 4130, inclusive. The bill has been reported by the same committee, and these amendments will be proposed when it shall come up for consideration. The amendments do not affect the substance of the bill, which, as I explained before, is one to revise the system of consular courts.

I desire to say to the Senate that on Monday next, after the order of the Anthony rule is completed, I shall ask the Senate to take up this bill. I shall at the same time ask the Senate to give me a very few moments in which to explain the provisions of the bill, and I think I can fairly say, and Senators will agree with me when the explanation is made, that the bill can be passed in a very short time. At that time I shall call up the bill unless an appropriation bill shall be in the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed. The Chair informs the Senator from Ohio that the unfinished business after the conclusion of the pending appropriation bill will be the Pembina Territorial bill.

Mr. JACKSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 526) granting a pension to Joshua S. Dye, to report it adversely and to submit a written report thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed under the rule, and the bill will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have all those adverse reports on pension cases placed on the Calendar, because my attention is called to many cases by my colleagues in the House, and I really do not know when such bills are reported whether they grant relief to persons whom I wish to look after. I should like to have this and all other House pension bills adversely reported placed on the Calendar.

Mr. JACKSON. I have no objection to the bills being placed on the Calendar, but in this case the person comes from the State of Kentucky.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot tell sometimes. This probably is not one of the cases I am called on to look after. However, let it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio want all the pension bills reported adversely placed upon the Calendar?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that would be better, as we are constantly moving to reconsider pension bills which have been indefinitely postponed. I have no particular care about this bill, but all from Ohio I should like to have put on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if at any time he shall discover that a bill has been indefinitely postponed by reason of his inattention, he can always obtain unanimous consent to have such a bill placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that would be a much more convenient course.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the Senator from Tennessee will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4966) for the relief of Thomas McMannus, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 615) to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to consider and pass upon certain claims now pending before them, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6401) granting a pension to Amelia Ann Wilson and her minor children, reported it with an amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4372) for the relief of Robert P. Walker, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Eliza H. Ramsay, widow of General George D. Ramsay, United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension, to report it adversely.

Mr. BLAIR. The majority of the committee report a resolution of indefinite postponement, which should go upon the Calendar of resolutions. In behalf of the minority I report a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Ramsay.

Mr. HARRIS. The minority cannot report a bill. The Senator can introduce a bill if he sees proper to do so.

Mr. BLAIR. That is what I do; I introduce a bill. The Senator will excuse the phraseology. It is a thing we have done a half dozen times this session. I ask that the bill may have its first and second reading and be placed on the Calendar, accompanied by the views of the minority.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 2132) granting a pension to Eliza H. Ramsay; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask to have the views of the minority printed in connection with the report of the majority made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1206) granting a pension to Mrs. Kate L. Usher, to report it without amendment. The committee has further considered the case and now reports it favorably. I suggest that it would be only just to have the bill take its former place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that that does not make any difference in the case of pension bills. They will all be considered some time before the close of the session.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1422) granting a pension to Mary Wade, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Ann Cornelia Lanman, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Joseph Lanman, praying for an increase of pension, to submit a report, accompanied by a bill. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] to the case.

The bill (S. No. 2133) granting an increase of pension to Ann Cornelia Lanman was read twice by its title.

Mr. JACKSON. I present in that connection the views of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the majority and the views of the minority will be printed under the rule.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3258) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth A. Hendrickson, to report it adversely and submit a report thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to the report.

Mr. PLATT. I submit the views of the minority of the committee, recommending the passage of the bill. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, and the report of the majority and the views of the minority will be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1808) granting a pension to Harriet E. Edwards, to report it adversely, and submit a report thereon. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] also has a minority report in this case.

Mr. PLATT. I ask to submit the views of the minority, giving their reasons why the bill should pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the majority and the views of the minority will be printed, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 369) granting a pension to Jacob R. McFarren, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1742) to increase the pension of Mohammed Kahn, otherwise John Ammahoe, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHILCOTT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3316) granting a pension to David Darling, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report an amendment to the naval appropriation bill, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the amendment which has just been reported by the Senator from Pennsylvania from the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Senator from Maine stated in some remarks which he made a few days ago that no committee had considered that subject. I call his attention to the further fact that this same amendment, in the form of a joint resolution, was reported some time since and placed on the Calendar, after having been considered for a long time by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. Does it provide for a commission?

Mr. ROLLINS. It does. The amendment is the text of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 78) for the appointment of a commission on the revival of international commerce in United States steamships suitable for naval uses.

Mr. FRYE. I am delighted. If the commission is provided for by the Committee on Appropriations, I think the mercantile marine may get as much as fifteen or twenty minutes' consideration.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1566) for the relief of Jacob Cramer, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1274) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah B. Franklin, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1661) granting a pension to Mary E. McConnell, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 723) granting a pension to George M. Chester, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

EMPLOYÉS OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Public Printer to pay the employés of the Government Printing Office the pay deducted from them during the obsequies of the late President Garfield, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment, and to ask the Senate to consider it at this moment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If it will not lead to debate, I shall not object.

Mr. DAWES. I presume it will not. If it leads to extended debate, I shall not press it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. The amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was to add, at the end of the joint resolution:

And a sufficient sum therefor is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

GARFIELD MEMORIAL CARDS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a joint resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) making an appropriation to defray the expense of printing the memorial cards to accompany the additional numbers heretofore ordered of the memorial address on the late President Garfield was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, That the sum of $175, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense of printing, at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, memorial cards to accompany the additional numbers heretofore ordered of the memorial address on the late President Garfield.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) authorizing the claim of David Stout Parker and Forman Matthews to be referred to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FERRY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2134) to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate return to the Secretary of War the papers and drawings forming the report of the board of heavy ordnance and projectiles, Senate Executive Document No. 178, when they are returned from the Public Printer.

These are original documents sent from the War Department to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be granted, there being no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1011) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. George;

A bill (S. No. 1532) granting a pension to George C. Quick;
A bill (S. No. 1576) granting a pension to Ellen Lardner; and
A bill (S. No. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Florida G. Casey.

ANNA M. MARSHALL.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the vote indefinitely postponing the bill (H. R. No. 2491) for the relief of Anna M. Marshall, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions, may be reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

ANN W. MULVEY.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the vote by which the bill (S. No. 1750) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ann W. Mulvey was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

DISTRICT TAX ARREARAGES.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 6242, being the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to allow me to call up House bill No. 5535, reducing the rate of interest upon arrearages of taxes in the District of Columbia. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who objected to its consideration, has withdrawn his objection, and I think there can be no objection to its passage. It will excite no discussion.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The river and harbor bill has been under consideration and has occupied a good deal more time than I expected it would, and I desire to have a vote upon it at the earliest moment. The necessity for action upon that will prevent me from yielding to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island to take up the bill he has indicated.

Mr. ALDRICH. Next Monday is the last District day in the House of Representatives, and this bill is reported with an amendment. If it is passed at all it will have to be passed to-day. It will excite no discussion. It is a matter of very great importance to the revenues of the District and it should be acted upon at once. It will excite no discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it leads to debate the Senator can withdraw it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will withdraw it if it leads to debate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I cannot yield, however, in any other case. I wish to give notice of that.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5535) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of taxes due July 1, 1879, and on all special assessments due the District of Columbia, and which may be paid by July 1, 1882, and for other purposes. It fixes the rate of interest to be collected on all general taxes in arrears on the 1st day of July, 1879, and on all special assessments due the District of Columbia at 6 per cent. per annum, in lieu of the rate and penalties now fixed by law.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 9, to strike out "July" and insert "November;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That act shall only apply to taxes and assessments paid on or before the 1st day of November, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of taxes due July 1, 1879, and on all special assessments due the District of Columbia and which may be paid by November 1, 1882, and for other purposes."

PENSION CASES.

Mr. PLATT. I cannot appeal this morning to the Senator from Minnesota, who has charge of the river and harbor bill, to allow me to call up the pension cases on the Calendar, but I want to give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall ask the Senate to consider the pension cases which are on the Calendar.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 7th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 62) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Terre Haute, Indiana;

An act (S. No. 750) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Shreveport, State of Louisiana; and

An act (S. No. 1875) for the erection of a public building at Harrisonburgh and Abingdon, State of Virginia.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 1011) granting an increase of pension to Daniel G. George;

A bill (H. R. No. 1488) granting a pension to Aaron Snyder;

A bill (H. R. No. 1576) granting a pension to Lydia S. Roark;

A bill (H. R. No. 1631) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Samuel J. Warner;

A bill (H. R. No. 1989) granting a pension to Mary A. Sanders;

A bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Esther M. Carey;

A bill (H. R. No. 2285) to increase the pension of James H. McNutt;

A bill (H. R. No. 2504) to increase the pension of Abram Colley;

A bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of Alice J. Bennit;

A bill (H. R. No. 3322) for the relief of Susan Shearer;

A bill (H. R. No. 3601) for the relief of Martha A. Jones;

A bill (H. R. No. 3717) granting a pension to Alvin Walker;

A bill (H. R. No. 3714) to increase the pension of Lafayette Axtell;

A bill (H. R. No. 4092) to increase the pension of Thomas E. Wilson;

A bill (H. R. No. 4562) for the relief of Julia A. Stimers;

A bill (H. R. No. 5299) granting an increase of pension to John Dwyer;

A bill (H. R. No. 5558) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Bayard;

A bill (H. R. No. 5725) granting a pension to D. F. Bashares;

A bill (H. R. No. 5771) to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to A. Schuyler Sutton," approved June 4, 1872;

A bill (H. R. No. 5906) granting a pension to Harriet N. Abbott;

A bill (H. R. No. 6400) granting a pension to Mrs. Orpah Meacham;

A bill (H. R. No. 6411) granting a pension to Catharine Stover;

A bill (H. R. No. 6412) granting a pension to Cynthia Martin, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6422) granting a pension to Henry S. Woodward;

A bill (H. R. No. 6521) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline A. Turner;

A bill (H. R. No. 6522) granting an increase of pension to Jerome B. Adams;

A bill (H. R. No. 6523) for the relief of N. C. Ridenour;

A bill (H. R. No. 6524) granting a pension to George C. Rust;

A bill (H. R. No. 6624) granting an increase of pension to Eliza F. Porter;

A bill (H. R. No. 6638) granting a pension to Eliza Atkins Merchant; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6681) granting a pension to Eliza H. Ramsay.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 6525) donating condemned cast-iron cannon and cannon-balls for monumental purposes; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 254) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer to "Typ" Best Post No. 75, Grand Army of the Republic, of Montrose, Iowa, one piece of condemned cast-iron cannon and cannon-balls, or field-piece, for monumental purposes.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CALL, Mr. GROOME, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. SHERMAN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BECK, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. VEST, and Mr. JOHNSTON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce as to the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. McMILLAN. This strikes out the provision providing for this improvement entirely.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no!

Mr. McMILLAN. It leaves it merely a survey.

Mr. BUTLER. It provides for a survey and a report and estimates for the construction and the annual maintenance and the economy of use. That is what the amendment is.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything on this amendment, but with the indulgence of the Senate I will say now a word or two. I want at the outset to have it understood that I am friendly to the proposition of constructing a sufficient and adequate and practicable water-way between the Mississippi and the lakes; that I believe such a work is a national work. While it does not in any direct degree affect the State which I in part represent, yet I am not for that reason less friendly to it. I believe there will be great and wide-spread benefits from the construction of such a water-way sufficiently wide and sufficiently extensive to make it in a very high sense a national work.

In order that those benefits may be secured, I believe that we must have a large canal, must have one capable of transporting vessels of larger tonnage perhaps than those contemplated by this amendment to the river and harbor bill.

I think, however, as one who is friendly to this measure, that it is not presented in the best shape as an amendment to the river and harbor bill for its ultimate success. I notice, in the first place, that the Committee on Commerce do not seem to have had the courage of their convictions in connection with this measure. While we have not had perhaps very accurate information about the ultimate cost of this work, no one, I believe, has placed it at less than about $4,000,000. We start in upon a great project of that kind with an appropriation of only $100,000. If we are ready to begin the work at all, and if it is a work in the opinion of the committee that ought to be constructed, it should have a much more liberal appropriation than this.

But I can readily understand that with the river and harbor bill swelled to the great proportions that it is now, the Committee on Commerce might well hesitate to put in the $1,000,000 upon this work that should have been in there if we were in a position and ready to go forward with its immediate construction.

I think, from what I have gathered from the discussion, that we have not any survey or estimate of the cost of a canal of the dimensions provided for in the amendment. I may be mistaken in this, but I gather that we have an estimate for a canal of larger size, and perhaps one of smaller size, and that the estimate of the cost of this canal is made up by some sort of calculation, addition to or subtraction from those two estimates.

I have ascertained also from the discussion that the eastern end of this canal, that part of it extending from the Illinois River to the city of Chicago, is now owned by the State of Illinois; that annual appropriations for its maintenance are made by the Legislature of that State, and that up to this time no conclusion has been reached as to whether the people of Illinois will surrender that part of the canal to the United States. I take it it must be clear to every Senator here that we ought not to spend one dollar in the way of work, that we ought not to lift a shovelful of earth until it is made certain that the eastern section of the canal from the Illinois River to Lake Michigan is to become the property of the United States, and is to be in its control like the western end, and a free canal. I suppose no one will entertain a project to build the western end of the canal and leave the eastern end under the control of the State of Illinois. It is to be one work from the Mississippi River to the lake at Chicago, under one control, and it is the contemplation of the friends of the measure that it will be so.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to interrupt him right here?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. What inducement would there be to the people of Illinois to vote to turn over the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the Government if the Congress of the United States should indicate to them that no appropriation would be made for opening the Hennepin Canal to make it a through route?

Mr. HARRISON. None whatever.

Mr. LOGAN. Then if the people of Illinois have to vote on that proposition, and they are met right at the threshold with a proposition that it is doubtful as to whether the Government will open up the Hennepin Canal to the Mississippi River, the people would say "They turn the Illinois and Michigan Canal over to the Government, the Government gets the canal and takes it away from them, and then does not appropriate the money to meet this proposition."

Mr. HARRISON. No; there is a perfectly natural way in which that should be done.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to a provision of the amendment of the committee?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. The last proviso in the amendment is in the following language:

That the State of Illinois shall have first surrendered to the United States the improvements made by said State on the Illinois River above Hennepin and the canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and shall consent to the provisions of this act by act of her Legislature before this act shall take effect and be operative.

Mr. HARRISON. Precisely. The Senator hardly supposes that I would discuss this question without having read that proviso. I will state the exact condition of things in Illinois to-day. They have a constitutional provision which prohibits the Legislature from entering into any arrangement with the Government or with anybody else in relation to this canal until the question has been submitted to a vote of the entire people giving their consent to such an arrangement. I am told that the Legislature of Illinois at its last session, which recently closed, proposed such a vote to the people of Illinois, in what terms I do not think any of us know, for that act of the Legislature of Illinois asking an expression of the people of that State of their willingness to surrender the canal has not been presented here. We do not know what terms it was suggested in. We do not know whether the terms of surrender are to be left to the discretion of the Legislature after the people have voted upon this proposition, or whether it is expressed in the act itself, the acts of the Legislature not yet having been published.

It seems to me that practically nothing but the work of survey can be done this summer. I think no friend of the canal can claim that we can do more than to do certain initiatory work of survey, and locate this canal. We can let no contract upon an appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Probably it would give the Senator a better opportunity to speak in reference to this question to hear the law read which the Legislature of Illinois passed. I have it here, and if he desires to hear it I will have it read at the desk.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it be read at the Clerk's desk. I send it to the desk.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

An act ceding the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the United States.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the people of the State of Illinois represented in the General Assembly, That the Illinois and Michigan Canal, its right of way and all its appurtenances, and all right, title, and interest which the State may now have in any real estate ceded to the State by the United States for canal purposes be, and are hereby, ceded to the United States for the purpose of making and maintaining an enlarged canal and water-way from Lake Michigan to the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers; and this cession is made upon the condition that the United States shall, within five years from the time this act takes effect, accept this grant, and thereafter maintain the said canal and water-way for the purpose aforesaid. In case the United States shall accept this grant, it is upon the express condition that the canal shall be enlarged in such manner as Congress may determine, and be maintained as a national water-way for commercial purposes, to be used by all persons, without discrimination, under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe; and the real estate aforesaid, hereby conveyed to the United States, shall be used, and the avails thereof applied, to carry out the objects of this grant, and for no other purpose, in such manner as Congress may determine.

SEC. 2. The General Assembly shall have power to withdraw and revoke this proposed grant at any time previous to its acceptance by Congress, but when the United States, by act of Congress, shall accept the grant and conditions provided for by section 1 of this act, the governor shall immediately thereafter execute and deliver in the name of the State of Illinois to the United States a deed of cession, in accordance with the provisions of this act, and shall then and there, or as soon as practicable, surrender all property mentioned in this act, to be granted to the proper authorities of the United States, and until the delivery of such deed and acceptance of the same (together with the property conveyed) by the United States the authority and duty of the State of Illinois to operate said canal and control its property and appurtenances shall in no respect be impaired.

SEC. 3. This act shall not take effect until it shall first have been submitted to a vote of the people of the State of Illinois, at the general election to be held on Tuesday, the 5th day of November, A. D. 1882, and have been approved by a majority of all the votes polled at such election. At the said election the ballots, in so far as they relate to this act, shall be in the following form: "For the act ceding the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the United States," and when so voted, it shall count in favor of this act; but if canceled with ink or pencil, it shall be counted against this act. The returns of the whole vote cast at said election and the votes for the adoption or rejection of this act shall be made and canvassed by the same officers and in the same manner as are the returns of the votes for senators and representatives of the State of Illinois, and if it shall appear that a majority of the votes polled are "For the act ceding the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the United States," the governor shall make proclamation thereof, and this act shall take effect from and after the date of such proclamation; but if a majority of the votes cast are "Against the act ceding the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the United States," then this act shall be null and void.

Approved April 28, 1882.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad that act has been read, and I wonder it was not brought to the attention of the Senate earlier in this discussion. It gives us now an exact understanding of the situation of the legislation in Illinois as to the eastern end of the canal. We have no assurance that we shall get control of it as a national work. It depends upon a popular election to be held in the State of Illinois next November. I concede there is great probability that the people of that State will vote to turn over the canal to us. I should think they would; but am I not right in saying to the friends of this measure that it would be better not to order the construction of the canal and appropriate money to be expended in its construction until the proposition of the State of Illinois to turn the canal over to us has been consummated by a vote of the people of Illinois? That vote will not be taken and certified before we shall again be in session here at the next session of Congress. We shall then have exact information as to what Illinois has done on this question and as to whether we can control the whole line of this proposed water-way, and shall not have entered upon the construction of a work which unless the eastern end of it is ceded will simply be turning tribute into a toll canal of the State of Illinois.

It seems to me, therefore, that if at this session we make a sufficiently liberal appropriation for a continued survey that will bring to us at the next session exact information as to the cost of the new work and of the enlargement of the old, we shall then be in a position not to make such an appropriation as this of $100,000, but to enter upon the construction of this work by an appropriation which will be adequate to the work of the magnitude that is contemplated. It seems to me that this legislation is premature, and that we should do better if we accepted the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. LOGAN. One word in reply to what the Senator from Indiana said in the latter part of his remarks. As I understood him, he said that unless the people of the State of Illinois should by a vote turn the Illinois and Michigan Canal over to the Government of the United States, this appropriation would be merely opening a water-way to make contributions to the State of Illinois by way of the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that the construction of the western division without the ownership of the eastern would simply be to give a free canal part of the way, while there was a toll canal the remainder of the way.

Mr. LOGAN. If that argument is good, then it will be necessary for the Commerce Committee to stop appropriations for the improvement of the Illinois River. The Illinois River, which is being improved now from La Salle to its mouth by appropriations from the Government of the United States, connects with the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the Government now contributes to the Illinois and Michigan Canal if the argument of the Senator is good for prohibiting this appropriation for this canal. The only difference is that it keeps the Illinois River open as a contributor to the Illinois and Michigan Canal, intead of this canal. That is all.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Will he be willing to appropriate the public money to build a free canal from the Mississippi River to Hennepin and connect it there with a toll canal owned by the State of Illinois as part of the same means of transit to the lakes?

Mr. LOGAN. The Government may possibly make it a toll canal after they build it. That is a matter for them to determine. If there is no other way of making a connection of water-ways for the benefit of the country than to connect with a toll canal, I would do it. That certainly would not be a great consideration in my mind. Of course I would prefer a free canal all the way through; but the fact that part of it was a toll canal would not prevent my action if it was a great highway that was necessary for the commerce of the country. The Government now, in opening the Illinois River and making it navigable for steamboats, opens it for the purpose of its commerce going to the Illinois and Michigan Canal, on which tolls have to be paid.

So far as the other proposition suggested by the Senator is concerned, I desire to call his attention to the fact that if this appropriation of $100,000, and only $100,000, is made, and the State of Illinois fails to do what the amendment provides she may do by a vote of the people, it is not a very extravagant outlay on the part of the Government of the United States, and the money is not to be expended, as I understand, unless the people of Illinois shall conform to that proposition. The Government is not a loser; the Congress of the United States has enacted no foolish law, but one that is perfectly consistent with the proposition to the people of Illinois in reference to turning over their canal to the Government of the United States.

One word in response to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said yesterday in regard to the canals of Ohio. There is one thing that seems by him to have been forgotten. The great commerce of the Northwest goes eastward; the products of the people of the Northwest hunt a market eastward. Prior to the time that we had the great trunk lines of railroad running east from the West, Ohio built her canals. How did she build them? North and south, expecting commerce to flow south; but the course of trade changed and dried up her canals. The canals failed, not because they were worthless, but because they were built in the wrong direction for the commerce of the people of the West. That is the reason why the Ohio canals are dried up to-day.

This proposition is to open a water-way between the East and the West, where the course of commerce is, where your canals do not dry up when they are in that direction. Take the Erie Canal for illustration, or any canal that goes with the course of commerce, and it does not dry up. It is only where the people have been mistaken in locating their public works that they have been failures. If the Senator had only thought a moment in reference to the course that trade has taken since the canals were constructed in his own State, I think he would not have made that argument against this proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I see no constitutional difficulties about this question, nor am I at all embarrassed as to whether Illinois will make a cession of her portion of this canal, if completed, to the United States Government; but I am opposed to the proposition of this amendment because, in my judgment, the work proposed will be worth nothing to the commerce of the country when it is done.

One of the cherished hopes of my life has been to see the great chain of northern lakes and the mighty Mississippi River united by a canal broad and deep enough to float the largest steamers that navigate that river or those lakes. Such an enterprise would be one worthy of this great nation, and would meet all the wants of western commerce; but what will be the benefit of this little narrow ditch that is proposed to be built from Rock Island to Hennepin, a distance of some sixty miles, over a mountain 300 feet high, and which is to be supplied by neither the water of the Mississippi River nor the Illinois River, but another stream, thirty or forty miles long, which is to be tapped and the water brought, by an immense outlay of engineering skill and money, over aqueducts and over dikes to the top of this ridge, where it is to supply the locks of the canal descending to the Mississippi River on one side and the Illinois River on the other? Why, sir, the little canal will be frozen half the year, and it will be interrupted one-half of the remainder of the year.

I yield to no man in the liberality of my views and votes in the Senate upon the question of internal improvements by the General Government. I believe that it is the duty of this Government to facilitate the internal commerce of the country by improving rivers and harbors quite as much as it is to encourage commerce with foreign nations. I believe the power of the General Government over rivers is co-extensive with the admiralty jurisdiction which covers all the navigable waters of the country, whether they are fresh or salt; but I do not believe that the appropriation contemplated in this bill, estimated to cost three or four million dollars, will construct a canal adequate to the demands of the commerce of the great and growing West.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to know from him or from some Senator who is favoring this measure whether after we have built this canal from Hennepin to the Mississippi River the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States will attach upon that body of inland navigation? That is a difficulty I have not been able to get over at all. We build a canal and put it entirely under the jurisdiction of the United States even down to the horses that pull the boats and I should like to know from some gentleman on this committee or the Senator from Kentucky whether, after we have assumed this jurisdiction upon the canal, the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States is thereby extended over this body of inland water?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will understand that I was not referring to that, but I had special objections to this canal because it was too small to be considered a national work. No steamboat can navigate it; nothing can run up or down it except small canal-boats or little barges. Does any man suppose that when a great steamer, laden with the heavy productions of the Northwest, descends the Mississippi River and comes to Rock Island it is going to break bulk and discharge its cargo into canal-boats to go to Chicago, to be rehandled there and again shipped to Buffalo, and from there to New York? Does any man suppose that is going to be done? The cost would be as great again as to ship it all the way around by New Orleans. Does he believe that when a tug-boat comes down with a flotilla of barges, extending for a quarter of a mile up the river, it is going to stop there and break up its fleet and hitch a couple of mules to each of these barges and have them dragged all the way up over the mountain, down the Illinois River, and then up to Chicago, consuming seven or eight days in accomplishing what could be done by railroad in as many hours almost? Your canal will not be done before some company will build a railroad alongside of it and dry the whole thing up in a year.

Mr. LOGAN. I would ask the Senator is there not a railroad running alongside of the Erie Canal?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Erie Canal is navigated by steamers.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is certainly mistaken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do you mean the Erie Canal of New York?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought you meant Lake Erie. Yes, there is a railroad by the side of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Does that dry it up?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; but it takes from it an immense trade.

Mr. LOGAN. That canal has produced $41,000,000 to the treasury of the State of New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are peculiar circumstances connected with the Erie Canal that make it exceptional to all the other canals that have been built elsewhere, and especially in the South and West. Take for instance the canals in South Carolina; they are all dried up. Take the James River and Kanawha Canal, which Virginia tried for years to turn over to the General Government, and at last gave a railroad company a bonus for taking. They have dried up the canal and built a railroad along its banks. It is nonsense to talk about such a ridiculous canal as this, with locks only twenty-one feet wide, meeting the commercial demands of the tonnage of the great commerce of the West.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as the Erie Canal is concerned, I have got over that point. It is held by the State of New York, not by the national Government, and the great want now felt there is the necessity for a larger and wider and deeper canal, through which steamboats may run. If gentlemen will bring in a bill as a distinct proposition looking to the construction of a canal wide and broad and deep enough for steamers to ply between Saint Louis, New Orleans, Chicago, and Buffalo, after examinations made by the engineers demonstrate that it is practicable, that it is advantageous, I will vote for it if it costs $20,000,000, because the Government could make no better investment than that. It would save to the farmers of the West and Northwest annually as much as the entire cost of the canal; each year there would be a saving to that amount, and it would relieve them from the tyranny of the exactions now made upon them by the railroads; but this little ditch, with locks twenty-one feet wide, will not accommodate half the commerce of the single State of Iowa. It will amount to nothing.

I am not opposed to canals, let me say to my friend from Illinois; but when you make one give us one large enough to be national in its character, broad and deep enough to float large steamers from the river to the lake. Let us see our freight passing from Saint Louis to Chicago and on to Buffalo. Give us outlets to the ocean by water and you will cheapen the freight of the Western farmer three or four or five cents a bushel, in my deliberate judgment, and save to him annually more than the cost of this canal. But this little canal which you propose to dig, with locks twenty-one feet wide, will carry nothing. It will perhaps accommodate the farmers that live along its banks; but it will afford no facilities to the commerce of the country generally. Build it wide and deep and I will vote for it. Then it can be justified as a national work; but a little canal like this over a mountain will amount to nothing.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator pretend to say that a canal 6 feet deep will carry nothing?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say a lock 21 feet wide is wholly inadequate to the commerce of any productive country.

Mr. LOGAN. But the Senator will allow me. Does he pretend to say that the dimensions of this canal are such as would prevent ordinary steamboats from passing through?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say so.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not pretend to say that it prevents steam navigation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the Senator to say that he proposes to construct a canal for steamboats? What sort of steamboats would run through a lock twenty-one feet wide?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about that; but I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he pretends that our steamers cannot pass through this canal? This canal is a commercial canal as contradistinguished from a ship-canal, and it will afford capacity for ordinary vessels on the Mississippi River.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not any man of sense know that no canal with locks twenty-one feet wide is wide enough to accommodate boats that will be of any benefit whatever to the commerce of the country? A little pleasure stern-wheel boat may go through, but when we attempt to make a national work of this sort let us make a work that will befit the character of the great nation that we are; let us build a canal broad and deep and wide enough for boats to pass from Buffalo to Saint Louis.

But this little proposition of digging a canal with locks twenty-one feet wide, a little ditch in the black mud of Illinois, and to talk about that being a canal national in its character to accommodate the commerce of the country is ridiculous in the extreme. I do not oppose it because it is unconstitutional, but because it is not big enough, and I am unwilling to waste the people's money in a project that is to result in no practical good to the country and expose us to the ridicule of the world.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to ask the Senator before he takes his seat if he knows the width of the Erie Canal?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe the width of the Erie Canal locks is eighteen feet, according to a document I have before me. The Senator has just been arguing that a lock twenty-one feet wide would not amount to anything.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would oppose the Government of the United States undertaking to build such a canal as that.

Mr. WINDOM. Does the Senator mean to say that the Erie Canal can do no work and does not amount to anything?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are exceptional conditions and circumstances that attend that canal, it being exactly in the line between Buffalo and the great exporting emporium of this continent, New York City.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to know are there any exceptional conditions which would make a canal with locks eighteen feet wide a success in New York, whereas one with locks twenty-one feet wide would be a failure in Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is only a partial success there now, because the great want is every day expressed by the men who have the management of it that it should be widened and deepened, and if they would fall on some plan by which its banks could be secured against the waves produced by steam it might be navigated by steamboats.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator is expressing his judgment to the Senate, and what I want to get at is whether there are any exceptional reasons why a canal with locks eighteen feet wide in New York should be a benefit to commerce, while a canal in Illinois with locks twenty-one feet will be a dead failure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On this canal you have to break bulk three times in going from Rock Island to Buffalo, or twice to Chicago, and in the other case you do not break bulk at all.

Mr. WINDOM. Does that make any difference as to the width of the locks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It enables you to take small boats, float them by mules where the freight is heavy and of a character where time does not count as money.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator considers that an answer as to the width of the locks, I will not trouble him further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I consider the Erie Canal in New York as having had a most beneficial influence on the commerce of the West in its day; but it now is not equal and up to the demands of the country. What they want there now is a canal that steamboats may run on, and that is the great question and the difficult question presented to the engineers of the country, how to arrange the banks so that the waves of a fast-running boat will not wash them down and fill up the canal and break through.

I dislike to vote against this measure, because I am pretty broad-gauged on the question of internal improvements. Many of my friends think I go a little too far. I shall hail the day when we have a broad canal that will connect the water-ways of the northern lakes with the great Mississippi, so that boats may go without interruption from New Orleans to Buffalo, giving the farmers an outlet to the sea by water for all the grain they export, and not leaving them at the merciless option of the railroads of the country. If gentlemen will frame a separate bill for this improvement and let it stand on its own merits, not shove it in here in this shape, but refer it for examination and investigation to men who are skilled and expert in this business, so that we may understand distinctly what it is to cost, what advantage it is to be to the commerce of the country, and what its practicability is, I will join in supporting the measure; but this little thing I do not vote for, because it is spending the people's money for a purpose that will do no good to the whole country, not even to the country through which it is to be dug.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, much has been said about the worthlessness of a canal the size of the one proposed. I have called the attention of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the fact that the Erie Canal has 71 locks 110 feet by 18 feet wide, or had at the time the report before me was made, and every one knows who is at all conversant with the transportation question of this country that the Erie Canal has performed a vast amount of work for the benefit of the country, and I believe that the Erie Canal has been worth untold millions, hundreds of millions, not only to the State of New York but to the entire West. The locks proposed in this amendment, as I understand it, are a good deal larger than those of the Erie Canal. I want to read also to the Senate an estimate, made without any reference to this discussion, of the capacity of this Hennepin Canal, not of the great and magnificent canal the Senator proposes to build, but the one proposed by this amendment to the pending bill:

> Assuming the canal to have a single line of locks and the time of the passage of a lock to be ten minutes—
> Which is about the time it takes—
> the ultimate capacity of the canal to pass freights eastward would be 4,838,400 tons per annum, equal to 161,280,000 bushels of grain during a season of navigation of two hundred and forty days.

If we could have a competing outlet from the States west of the Mississippi River that would carry 161,000,000 bushels of grain during the season of navigation, it would be an immense benefit to the people of that section, as well as to the whole country. I have heard two or three Senators in discussing this question speak of the fact that the Illinois and Michigan Canal is of no value, that it does not amount to anything in the transportation of heavy products, and we have been told of the large number of canals that have been dried up. I am aware of the fact that in several of the States the railroad companies, having gotten control over the Legislatures, have succeeded in buying out the canals in order to prevent the competition which they afford to the railroads, and I think that fact accounts more than any other for the circumstance that some of the canals have been suspended.

I want to read very briefly a statement of the effect of the so-called worthless Illinois and Michigan Canal which has been referred to here. I read now as to the condition of things in 1873:

> Comparative charges for the transport of grain to Chicago by rail from point one hundred miles distant on five different roads: Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, for carrying 100 pounds one hundred miles, 8 cents.

The road lies alongside the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the charge is but 8 cents per 100 pounds, or was then, for one hundred miles. Here are four other roads that do not have the canal competition, and I will give you what were the charges for one hundred miles on those roads:

> Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, 14 cents.
> Chicago and Northwestern, 18 cents.
> Chicago and Alton, 12 cents.
> Illinois Central, 16 cents.

So that this worthless Illinois and Michigan Canal does exert a competing influence over the railroad which runs alongside of it, whereby that railroad was compelled to carry for 8 cents per hundred pounds per hundred miles, while other roads not affected by that competition charged 14, 18, 12, and 16 cents for carrying the same weight the same distance.

There is another illustration of the effect of the Illinois and Michigan Canal which I wish to call to the attention of the Senate. The freight charged on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad, as I have already said, was 8 cents per hundred pounds from Henry to Chicago, between which points the canal competes, while the rate from Tiskilwa, only twelve miles further west than Henry, and beyond the effect of canal competition, was 15 cents per hundred pounds, or nearly as much for twelve miles where there was no water competition as for the hundred miles where the Illinois and Michigan Canal competed. I believe that substantially that relation will be carried out wherever canals compete with railroads. The Senator from Kentucky says that the Erie Canal has peculiar circumstances favorable to water transportation. I know of none that would not exist on this canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will pardon me a moment. I ask him, if it is of such value, why is it that the State of Illinois is so anxious to relieve herself of that elephant?

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot answer for the State of Illinois; I have not looked into that question, but I presume the State of Illinois would be glad, as all the Northwestern States would be, to have the great water system of the Mississippi connected with the lake system, and I presume she is ready to do any reasonable thing to bring that about.

I was about to say, however, that in my judgment there are no conditions favorable to water transportation on the Erie Canal that do not exist on the proposed Hennepin route. The Erie Canal connects the lakes and the Hudson River; the Hennepin Canal connects the mighty Mississippi system with the lake system.

The Senator says that you cannot separate barges started for New Orleans and send them across this route, because they would not climb this mountain and go to the eastward. I can tell him that notwithstanding the cheapness of the Mississippi River, and no one can be more its advocate than I am, and always have been, there is a magnet in the city of New York, the mighty power of the money capital of that city, which would not only take this freight largely over this little elevation, but does now compel it to climb the Alleghany Mountains over railroads at a much higher cost than it can be carried down any river. We of the West, and the men of the East too, I think, need the advantage of a cheap water line from one great system to the other. Connect those systems by your water line, and I assure the Senator you will not have the slighest difficulty in supplying it with an immense business and in checking the railroad charges over that space of country. I think I am safe in saying that the cost of transportation is to-day, though I have not the figures before me, but I know it was so when I last investigated it, greater between the Mississippi River and the lakes than from Chicago to New York. I think it costs more to-day to carry a bushel of wheat two hundred miles from the Mississippi River than it does nine hundred miles from Chicago by water transportation to New York.

We want to reach out that arm of the sea until it touches the Mississippi River, and, combining these two vast systems, gives to the great agricultural interest of the Northwest the vast benefits of cheap transportation. It will not answer for the Senator from Kentucky and others to tell the farmer of that country that we do not want to give him this canal with a capacity for 160,000,000 bushels a season; this is not big enough; we want to wait until we can give him a mighty ship-canal that will float the vessels of Lake Erie into the Mississippi River. He and his associates will tell you in response, "Give us something practicable, and cease talking about that which we know you will never give us."

WAR DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to lay aside this bill for a moment until I can have a joint resolution passed which it is necessary to have passed this morning, which I will explain briefly. It is to provide for an omission in a previous resolution to cover some employés who are not covered by the joint resolution passed the other day extending the appropriations of last year for twenty days.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) authorizing the payment temporarily of certain employés of the War Department in the following words:

> Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be paid from the appropriation heretofore made for the support of the Army for the current fiscal year the compensation of employés engaged in the Quartermaster-General's Department and Subsistence Department, in the investigation of claims under the act of July 4, 1864, and the necessary expenses of such investigations for that part of the current fiscal year ending on the 20th day of July, 1882.

Mr. GARLAND. Have the Committee on Appropriations considered the resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. I have consulted nearly all the members of the Committee on Appropriations. It is a matter so manifestly necessary that it ought to be passed to-day.

The joint resolution was read three times, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SLATER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6716) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JACKSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAUNDERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 6616) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5538) to reduce internal-revenue taxation; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside temporarily and the river and harbor bill will be proceeded with. The Chair hears no objection, and that will be the order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6242) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to one remark of his. He asked, if the Illinois and Michigan Canal was of any profit to the State of Illinois why was the State so anxious to get rid of the elephant? I think that was his language. I desire to say for the benefit of that Senator that the State of Illinois is not anxious to get rid of the Illinois and Michigan Canal because it is an elephant, for it is not. The Illinois and Michigan Canal affords a profit to the State, and pays annually into the Treasury, over and above its expense, a large amount. It has never been an elephant on the hands of the people of Illinois. They are merely willing to turn it over to the Government of the United States in connection with this water-way that is to be made connecting the Mississippi River and the lakes for the benefit of commerce generally. That is the only reason.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator whether the State of Illinois could not also make a profit by extending the canal from Hennepin to Rock Island?

Mr. LOGAN. The constitution of the State of Illinois now prohibits the people from engaging in building canals or railroads, so that they cannot do it, no matter whether it would be profitable or unprofitable. But in reference to the Erie Canal, I suppose the Senator from Kentucky is perfectly conversant with the canal system and the railroad system, and all the other systems of this country, and their profits, and where they are not profitable, but I will ask him to examine for a moment the report of the canal commissioner of New York, as I believe he is called, Mr. Seymour, for the last year, and see whether the Senator's remarks in reference to the Erie Canal corroborate or not the statements of the canal commissioner of New York. His report shows that the lumber transported last year was twice as much as the entire tonnage of the Erie Canal in 1843.

The Senator said the railroads were transporting everything and the canals did not increase in transportation but were nearly drying up. The fact is shown in this report that the tonnage was twice as much in the one article of lumber on the Erie Canal last year as the entire tonnage of that canal in 1843. Not only that; there were carried thirty-eight years ago by canal 51,219 tons of stone, lime, and clay; in 1881, one year ago, there were carried 235,514 tons of the same articles on that canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I should like to ask the Senator, as he is so well informed on the subject of canal operations, to tell the Senate the profits of the Ohio canals?

Mr. LOGAN. I will do so if the Senator will allow me to go on. I am talking about the Erie Canal now, as that was the canal the Senator called the attention of the Senate to. Let us attend to one thing at a time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I drew a distinction between the Erie Canal and the Mississippi River, that the freights coming down the Mississippi River going to the seaboard, which would seek an outlet by way of the lakes, would have to be brought down by great steamers, and their bulk would have to be broken to get into this proposed waterway, and changed twice in going to New York; whereas at Buffalo, when a great steamer leaves Chicago with two or three hundred thousand bushels of grain, and gets to Buffalo, she has to discharge her cargo there, in consequence of the Falls of the Niagara below, and there are but two ways of getting to New York—one by railroad and the other by the Erie Canal. If the canal was broad enough to admit a steamer starting from Chicago to go directly to New York, does not the Senator think it would be a much greater benefit to western commerce than the canal now existing?

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but I was trying to answer the Senator's proposition. If he will allow me I will show him wherein his argument fails and his illustration fails.

In 1843 there were little more than 20,000 tons of coal transported by way of the Erie Canal; in 1881 there were 1,000,000 tons transported over that canal, showing an increase, instead of the canal drying up and decreasing. Take it as a fact that it is small, as the Senator says it is, and it ought to be larger, yet although small, with railroads right alongside, its tonnage is increasing every year from 20,000 tons of coal in 1843 to 1,000,000 tons of coal in 1881; from 20,000 tons of stone, &c., in 1843, to two hundred and fifty-odd thousand tons in 1881, and so on. Up to last year the report of the New York canal commissioner shows that instead of the Erie Canal being practically abandoned, as the Senator says, its increase in the last year was 5,175,505 tons, and the receipts of last year amounted to $818,264. Instead of it being abandoned it increases annually right by the side of your railroads that you are speaking of. And yet this canal that we desire now to appropriate for is a larger canal in its locks and dams than the Erie canal, and will pass through it larger vessels than the Erie Canal. Yet the Senators think it is too small to be of any benefit to the people of the country.

If I had time to go into the reports they would show that the Erie Canal, in opposition to railroad transportation in our wheat and corn and other products of the West, has saved within the last few years millions of dollars to the people of that country. The argument of the Senator is that the canal is not sufficient in capacity to float the tonnage of the West. That is true; a dozen canals would not do it, and all the railroads that you have do not do it. Freights are piled up mountain high all over the West from one year's end to the other for want of transportation. It is no argument to say that the proposed canal will not float enough tonnage to transport all the products of the country. It will float a part of them, and deplete that portion that stands in the granaries from one year's end to the other.

There is one other thing that strikes me as singularly strange. Senators here oppose this canal, but say they are in favor of it. The Senator from Kentucky and one or two other Senators say, "I am in favor of this canal; it is very important, but I am opposed to this proposition." It reminds me of the orator in Maine once making a speech to his constituents, who said he was in favor of the Maine liquor law, but he was against its enforcement.

Mr. FRYE. That was in New Hampshire.

Mr. LOGAN. It was in New Hampshire, perhaps; but somewhere up in the East. That is exactly the position of these Senators. They are in favor of this canal, but they are opposed to the proposition that will put it in operation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not a proposition; only a suggestion.

Mr. LOGAN. What kind of a proposition are you in favor of?

Mr. BUTLER. To have a survey and estimate.

Mr. LOGAN. We have had surveys upon surveys, and they are not satisfactory. What will satisfy the Senator? He says he wants a larger canal; he would vote for a larger one, but he will not vote for a small one. We can make it large enough to be satisfactory, if the Senator wants a larger one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will pardon me. I said I was opposed to it on the very limited and unsatisfactory information we had; we had not sufficient information to make this appropriation. We should have a distinct proposition, have a thorough investigation, and a report made from the proper and competent authorities, demonstrating the practicability and estimating the cost of the thing, and then I would be for it. But in view of the enormous and extraordinary appropriations which we are called upon to make at this session of Congress, amounting in one single item of pensions to $100,000,000, and in this bill that we are considering to $20,000,000, I was not willing to forego the labor and the importance of improving the rivers and harbors that God had already given us to undertake to dig new rivers in the dark without knowing what we were doing and what they were going to cost.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to know how long a time—for I want to live long enough, if I can, to see something done with this canal—these Senators desire these examinations to be made.

Mr. BUTLER. Six months longer.

Mr. LOGAN. In 1832 a report was made on the Illinois River by General Joseph E. Johnston. He was then the engineer making that survey, and from 1832 down to the present time surveys have been made time and again in reference to this canal, and in reference to the Illinois River; but it seems impossible to get one to be satisfactory. No matter what the survey was, no matter what the estimate, it makes no difference, it is unsatisfactory.

Some Senators say canals are dried up when they run north and south in their States, when their projectors did not understand the channels that commerce was going to take, and because they have dried up we are told another canal will dry up also. The Senator from Kentucky says the canals in South Carolina have dried up. That is no argument. In Illinois they will never dry up. In a country that produces as Illinois and Iowa and the contiguous territory there is no canal and no water-way or roadway that has ever been dried up in transporting the products of the soil. If your canals dry up, it is because you have not the products; if your canals dry up, it is because they run the wrong way; if they dry up, it is because the canals were made in the wrong direction, and it is not the fault of the system itself.

In reference to this proposition the people of the Northwest ask about as little as any other people on this appropriation bill. This is a matter that is of importance to all our States in the Northwest, in fact to all west of the Mississippi River and east of the Mississippi River. We have attempted it year after year. This same project has been tried over and over again in Congress, and the same arguments have been made heretofore that are made to-day. One Senator says the canal is too small, another that it is too large; another says we want another survey. We get another survey, and that is not satisfactory. It is only an excuse. I say to Senators who attempt to defeat this measure by professing to be for it that it is only stabbing it in the dark, for a friend of this measure is not going to stop its progress because of the fact that the estimate has not been made as to what it will cost to run it after it is once completed. I like friends of a measure to be for it or to be against it. In my judgment, there is no friend of this measure who wants to defeat it because it is too small or because it is too large. We do not take that kind of taffy out in our country; we do not have that kind given to us, and do not accept it.

It is in very bad taste for States who get appropriations for every river and ever creek and every little duck-puddle that they pretend is a harbor to oppose a proposition that will open a great line and a great water-way from the East to the West by way of the lakes. One would suppose from the arguments that have been made here to-day and yesterday that railroads must carry all the products of this country, that private corporations are the only things that the people of the country are to look to for the benefits that are to be derived, and that every proposition that goes along by the side of these corporations that is likely to reduce their swelled and enormous profits one cent must be attacked and strangled in the Senate Chamber of the United States.

Why, sir, if Senators had been attorneys for railroads, which they are not, they could not have made stronger arguments than have been made against this proposition. They have made the same arguments that I have heard made by presidents of railroads against the Hennepin Canal in my own State. What we hear is the argument in favor of the private corporation against the people; it is the argument that the canal is too slow for a benefit; that this is the railroad age, the age of lightning and railroads, and that the canal is too slow. This is the age of the hare against the tortoise according to the argument of the Senator from Kentucky. Therefore one must not be supported because the other outstrips it in speed. These arguments to my constituents are not good; these arguments to the people of the Northwest are not good. This is a project dear to their hearts, one that they have had in view from year to year.

The State of Illinois has proffered time and again to do that which would be right on her part to give this grand water-way into the hands of the Government of the United States, because of the fact that the Government was taking control of the water-ways all over the country. One Senator argues that you have no right to take control of the railroads; another that you have no right to build canals. If you have no right to build canals in competition with railroads, if you have no right to take hold of them or have anything to do with them, what does that argument mean? The logic of it is that the Government, the country, and the people are turned over to these corporations, and there is no way from under their power and weight.

Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say in reference to this matter. I hope we may have a vote. If the Senate of the United States is determined to put its foot on this proposition now and allow it to sleep forever for the benefit of railroads—for that is what it means—let it do so.

Mr. HAWLEY. Nevertheless, Mr. President, a proposition to spend five or six million dollars, and to involve ourselves in an annual expense of $300,000 perpetually hereafter, is a serious proposition on a measure that appropriates only $100,000. It involves from ten to twenty-five million dollars.

There is a mistake made by some gentlemen in supposing that we of the East have not as direct an interest, or very nearly as direct an interest, in this matter as they have. We desire the products of the West to come cheaply to the East, and we desire to send our products West cheaply. We are greatly interested, and warmly interested, in the success of all reasonable enterprise; but the Government is embarking in a slightly "new departure" in this case. We have no great systems of that kind maintained by annual appropriations of our Government. Mind, it is not proposed to ask one mill of toll of anybody crossing this canal. We are to manage the whole of it; we are scarcely to be able to know whether the ditch is paying or not, except as we take the statistics of such vessels as pass through.

Canals have failed, and canals may fail again. Canals have failed rapidly within twenty-five years; first because they are too slow, and in the next place because they are too narrow and too limited in their burden; the demand is for broader and deeper canals for steam-power. The famous Erie Canal is studying that problem now and endeavoring to apply steam, most favorably, I think, by the Belgian system of a cable being conducted through it. The canals of New York are over nine hundred miles in length. There are only four of them that are maintained by the State; the others are all offered for sale or proposed abandonment. The only ones that the State retains are the Erie, Champlain, Oswego, Cayuga, and Seneca. The latter three lose money every year; lost $88,000 last year. The Erie Canal is the only one that pays; it received last year $310,000.

Canals have failed largely also because they do not connect great natural water-ways. The Erie has been a partial success, a great success, I will say, because it is a part of a great natural water-way. Here are the Chemung, the Chenango, the Black River, the Genesee Valley, the Oneida Lake, the Baldwinsville, the Oneida River Improvement, the Seneca River, the Cayuga Inlet, and the Crooked Lake Canal, which the State is ready to sell or abandon. I should add that it has abandoned the Chemung and the Genesee Valley; and the main portion of the Chenango has been declared abandoned for purposes of navigation.

It is therefore not unreasonable if we ask deliberate and careful estimates about canals before we embark upon an expenditure of ten or twenty million dollars. It is perfectly and absolutely reasonable and in accordance with business sense.

This proposition should have been an independent measure; it should have been entitled "A bill to establish a canal between Chicago and the Mississippi River." It is called the Hennepin Canal, that is, for sixty-seven miles of it, with thirty-eight miles of a canal feeder. There are one hundred miles of the line already established, seven feet deep, and then nineteen miles on the Illinois River, and this proposed addition is to be but six feet deep. It will not stay so. The estimates and plans and the deliberate report of scientific men upon this work should state what ought to be the permanent width and depth of the whole length, and what is to be the cost of the whole length. The estimate is $4,600,000 by Mr. Wilson, and 25 or 26 or 27 per cent. addition is the ordinary fair allowance; and so the canal is to cost not less than six millions. You cannot run very well the whole two hundred and twenty-five miles of it, more or less, for less than something like $300,000 a year, the capital of which is $5,000,000, making the cost directly before us now in this bill not far from $10,000,000. It may be all worthless, or it may be worth all of that cost and more; I do not say; but I do affirm that we have not the proper estimates; I do affirm that I am as ready as any man living west of it, or in the vicinity of it, to make a large and liberal expenditure for a great improvement in the water-ways; no one any more so.

I have received a telegraphic dispatch this morning from the vicinity of this canal addressed to me, I suppose because I suggested the question about the loss of power from Rock River. There is a word in it which the senders should have changed; they should have said "erroneous," instead of "false." But the Senator from Iowa informs me that he waives all objection to that part of it. The telegram is addressed to myself, and is as follows:

STERLING, ILLINOIS, July 8, 1882.

Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, U. S. Senate, Washington:

The statement by Senator ALLISON that the water-power of Rock River will not be injured by the building of Hennepin Canal with feeder from Rock River is false. During the dry season the flow of water is hardly sufficient to run the manufactories now in operation. The damage to Sterling alone will not be less than $5,000,000 which, of course, we should expect the General Government to make good. Please present our case.

This embraces, evidently, all the capital and business of that town. I do not know any of these gentlemen, but their occupations are given and they speak for themselves. They think it will damage the water-power of Sterling $5,000,000. The other side say it will not; the issue is joined. I would rather have the engineer's report upon it. I have done my duty in presenting a very strong remonstrance from that region.

Mr. ALLISON. In view of the suggestion in that telegram I trust the Senate will bear with me a few moments.

These people at Sterling seem to think that I made a false statement with reference to the question of water-power. Of course I allow something to them by way of prejudice, arising from the fact that this navigable feeder is to begin at Dixon rather than at Sterling, and that the town of Dixon, which is a rival town, will have an advantage over this great city of Sterling when this canal is constructed.

As to their disposition, however, to amplify and magnify their own affairs, I only want to call attention to the letter read by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] yesterday, signed by a committee, in which they said that the two towns of Sterling and Rock Falls have 8,000 people and that they have invested in manufactures $200,000,000, and that their product is $600,000,000 of manufactured articles per annum. Eight thousand people with a capital of $200,000,000 discloses that every man, women, and child in Sterling is worth about $25,000 on the average. I submit that they have rather a magnified notion of their own capacity and financial ability.

Now one word of reference to my statement upon the water-power question. Mr. G. P. Low, engineer, made a survey for this feeder, and I will read from his report. He states in the first place that he was very fortunate in touching Rock River at a time when the people said to him that it was at its lowest stage of water known for many years. Now allow me to read briefly:

> We were fortunate in making a careful measurement of the amount of water flowing in the Rock River at a time, October 11, 1870, when, according to the residents of that city, the river was at its lowest known stage. The amount of water at that date was found to be 2,446 cubic feet per second, which, under the present available head of 7 feet, gives, theoretically, 1,943 horse-power. To economize earth-work upon the feeder line and summit level, it will be advisable to raise the crest of Dixon dam 2 feet, thus increasing the head of water to 9 feet. After deducting 901 cubic feet per second for the canal—

Now mark this:

> After deducting 901 cubic feet per second for the canal, there will be available for manufacturing purposes in the dryest times 1,545 cubic feet, or 1,578 horse-power, under the 9-foot head. The loss of power at this point, after allowing for the increased height of dam, will be equal to 365 horse-power, or 18.8 per cent. of that at present available.

So that a canal which he is now describing, having locks 350 feet long and 75 feet wide—he was providing for a ship-canal and not for this little commercial canal that my friend from Kentucky is so disturbed about; he was providing for a canal made upon the scale suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, although not nearly large enough for him—takes only 901 cubic feet per second. The canal which we propose here takes 217 cubic feet per second, allowing two hundred lockages per day, or twice as many lockages as are made in the Erie Canal, which carries, as I stated the other day, nearly seven million tons per annum. So that of all this vast water-power only 217 feet or about one-twentieth will be taken by the proposed canal; and yet these gentlemen, with the facts before them, undertake to say that I have made false statements here when I have only taken the statements of the engineer who carefully measured this whole water-power and understands this whole question.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to some figures which I think he did not read? I find them about the same place, page 305 of the report of 1871, near the top of the page:

> The loss of power at this point, (Dixon,) after allowing for the increased height of dam, will be equal to 365 horse-power, or 18.8 per cent. of that at present available. The loss at Sterling not being compensated for by a higher dam will be equal to 36.8 per cent. of the present power.

Mr. ALLISON. That does not change the facts I have stated except——

Mr. HAWLEY. That is for the larger canal, to be sure.

Mr. ALLISON. Except the fact that Sterling does not have the benefit of the feeder.

Mr. HAWLEY. Sterling has a loss of 36.8 per cent., and the bill submitting to the people of Illinois the question as to whether they will surrender the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the Federal Government, if I recollect aright, contains a proviso that the Federal Government shall enlarge said canal, which is now one foot deeper than the western section as here proposed.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no provision of that kind in this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. In the Illinois bill providing for a submission to a popular vote of the proposition to surrender the Illinois and Michigan Canal to the Federal Government, as I understand, there is a proviso that we shall enlarge that canal, which is already one foot deeper than the one proposed in this amendment. The act of the Illinois Legislature in its first section says:

> In case the United States shall accept this grant, it is upon the express condition that the canal shall be enlarged in such manner as Congress may determine, and be maintained as a national water-way for commercial purposes, to be used by all persons, without discrimination, under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Illinois and Michigan Canal only allows transportation of boats now of one hundred and eighty tons burden. This provides for boats of two hundred and eighty tons burden. Especially this law requires substantially that the Illinois and Michigan Canal shall be enlarged so as to be on a par with the Hennepin Canal.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have not found out the width of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot.

Mr. HAWLEY. I know it is seven feet deep, and the new canal here proposed is to be six feet, not seven feet. The old canal is to be enlarged if we accept it, and they are all to be part of one system.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McMILLAN. After the conclusion of the Senator's remarks I shall ask the Senate, if the debate is to continue, that remarks shall be limited to five minutes by each gentleman.

Mr. MORGAN. You had better get rid of this amendment before you insist on that.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall not interfere with the Senator's remarks.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the act of the Legislature of Illinois which has been read here this morning puts some new light on this case, and suggests at least two very important questions, which I think we ought to take some consideration of now. The first of these questions is this: this measure, if it shall pass in connection with that act, creates a contract between the State of Illinois and the United States Government. What is that contract? It is that in consideration that Illinois will yield to us the canal from the Illinois River to Lake Michigan, and that we will enlarge that canal, we shall have the right to build a canal from Hennepin to Rock Island. When we have undertaken this work under the provisions of this amendment to the bill, and have instructed the Secretary of War to proceed to the construction of this canal, Congress will be bound and will bind the United States Government to go on to the completion of this work, although we may hereafter ascertain that it is of no public utility at all. Its impracticability will be no excuse to the Government of the United States for repealing or revoking this act. There should be a provision in this law authorizing Congress, notwithstanding this contract, to alter, amend, or repeal this enactment, so that after we have spent this $100,000 in the survey, if it should turn out in the opinion of our engineers that the work is not going to be of practical advantage to the country, or after we have spent the $100,000 in preliminary work on the canal, we shall not be bound by a contract with the State of Illinois to go on and complete that work. But such is the obvious effect of the act of legislation which was read this morning by the Senator from Illinois, taken in conjunction with this act of Congress. It is very far more that we are doing here than the mere construction of a canal on the authority of the United States Government and subject to its control. We bind ourselves by a solemn obligation under this law that we will go on to complete that work, no matter what its extent may be, and no matter how little of public utility there may be connected with it.

The next question that is suggested by the act of the Legislature of Illinois is this: Illinois in that act has ceded nothing at all to the United States Government except the land, the right of way, the right to build this canal upon a certain specified area of land within that State and the land belonging to the State of Illinois connected with its existing canal system. Now, I should like to know—and I interrupted a Senator on the floor a while ago to put the question—what is to be the condition of this navigable stream in the law of the United States as to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of this country over it? The State of Illinois yields nothing; it concedes nothing except merely the right of way through the bosom of its territory.

Mr. CONGER. The provisions of the law of Illinois have no reference to the Hennepin Canal proper. The State of Illinois has a canal, with locks and improvements on the canal, between Chicago and La Salle, which it has constructed, which will be a part of this system; and the provision of this amendment is that the State shall surrender there, as was done in Kentucky in regard to the Louisville Canal and in other places, the right to the property which it has in the canal. That it surrenders to the United States. That has no reference at all to the Hennepin Canal proper. That is the canal to be made between Hennepin and Rock Island, sixty-five miles. All that is asked of Illinois is a surrender of its locks and dams and canal and the land upon which it has expended its own funds heretofore.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I understand that the Legislature of Illinois, which has passed a law and submitted it to the people for ratification in November, has made no provision at all under which Congress may exercise its jurisdiction or power, whatever you please to call it, to build a canal from Hennepin to Rock Island.

Mr. CONGER. The State of Illinois as a State has no property interest there.

Mr. MORGAN. I have always understood, and I get my information on that subject from the Supreme Court of the United States, that the United States Government has no right to enter a State, without her consent, to make a work of internal improvement. When she wants to go there to get land for a court-house she has to get the consent of the State to it or else by process of condemnation to condemn the land to public uses.

Mr. CONGER. But there are hundreds of different streams, almost millions of miles, where we provide for the improvement of watercourses in almost every State of this Union where the United States takes possession of the river and makes the improvement and has never thought of asking permission to go and make it, and no State has given authority for that purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. And that in virtue of the fact that the United States Government has jurisdiction over the navigable waters of this country in the States as well as anywhere else.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to call his attention to the fact that there is a provision here which is contained at the close of the amendment——

Mr. MORGAN. I was about to call attention to that, that the consent of the State of Illinois shall be obtained.

Mr. McMILLAN. That the State of Illinois "shall consent to the provisions of this act by act of her Legislature before this act shall take effect and be operative."

Mr. MORGAN. I was about to ask, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, where is the necessity of having that provision in this law? If the Congress of the United States may enter a State without its consent and build a canal or railroad, why did the committee ever suppose it was necessary, and why is it necessary to put the same consent into all of our propositions for forts, dock-yards, arsenals, public buildings, &c. It is because the State has the jurisdiction, has the right of eminent domain upon the land within her borders, but she has not that right of eminent domain upon the navigable water-courses within her borders so as to exclude the power of Congress to provide for the improvement of those streams. The difference is as old as the Constitution, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have always run parallel with it, and so the committee thought when they put the provision in here that the consent of the State of Illinois should be first obtained before this act should come into effect.

The State of Illinois has not given her consent in the act mentioned by her Senator any further, as I understand it as explained by the Senator from Michigan, than that part of the constructed canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago. As to the other part of it she has given no consent whatever. She must hereafter give her consent before we can enter that State and build a canal by the condemnation of land, or by the receipt of voluntary contributions of land, or in any way. I would never admit the doctrine that the Government of the United States had a right to go into Alabama and to build a canal to connect the Alabama River with the Chattahoochee River without the consent of that State, nor would any Senator here admit it; but this committee, on the contrary, have expressly announced a different doctrine by putting the provision in the bill itself.

But what do we get under this existing law of Illinois? We do not get, it appears now, anything as between Hennepin and Rock Island. More than that, this provision does not contemplate the existing act of the Legislature of Illinois; it contemplates an act to be hereafter passed by that Legislature. The Legislature of Illinois has already passed a law on this subject to become such as a final and obligatory enactment if her people at the ballot-box in November shall ratify and confirm that act. The Congress of the United States certainly does not expect to interpose between the Legislature of Illinois and the people and to accept that act of the Legislature as the one to which this bill is to be applicable. That act of the Legislature is not contemplated in this bill. It is some act to be enacted in the future, and not one that already exists, particularly of the character to which I have alluded where the act itself is subject to the ratification of the people.

Mr. President, some provision of the law must be made in this new case whereby it can be determined after this navigable stream, as we will call it, is opened by the Government of the United States and placed exclusively within its jurisdiction, whether or not the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States attaches upon that water-course or whether the laws of Illinois are to control. Congress cannot escape now from some determination of that question, and it is essential that it should be determined in this bill; in the initial part of the bill, for, as I have already observed, when we pass this bill and Illinois accepts and ratifies the provisions of it, as is herein required, we have then got something more than a law to deal with hereafter; we have got a law and a contract both, and a very important contract, one of immense magnitude, from which the Government of the United States cannot recede under the provisions of this bill after we have once enacted it into a law. Therefore, I think we should be extremely careful about this matter. If this amendment should be adopted I shall propose to amend it as follows:

Provided, That so much of this act as applies to the canal from the Illinois River to the Mississippi River and from the Illinois River to Lake Michigan may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by an act of Congress, and any agreement made with the State of Illinois to carry into effect any part of this act shall be subject to the power of Congress so to alter, amend, or repeal said parts of this act.

I am not willing, for one at least, to commit the country to a proposition in the nature of a contract, a proposition that becomes a contract, that we shall build this canal and spend all the millions of money that may be required to build it, although in the mean time we may find out that it is of no possible advantage to the general commerce of the country or even to the commerce of Illinois.

Something has been said here about railroads and the competition between railroads and water-courses. I, sir, am a friend of the water-courses of this country in competition with the railroads, because I believe that they will have a great and controlling effect in the reduction of freights and fares upon railroads. I am not interested in any railroad; I am not the friend or patron of any railroad system in the world. I am independent entirely in my opinions and in my relations from all the existing lines of railroad, and I expect to be of all that may hereafter exist. My opposition to this measure is based mainly on grounds that I have already stated to be constitutional grounds. I perhaps have very few Senators to concur with me in those opinions upon it; I will not restate my opinions, but I state the fact that my opposition is chiefly upon constitutional grounds to justify myself in a further remark that I desire to make, which is this: we have made land grants to railways throughout the country and built them up; we have encouraged them in every way that we could; we have invited men to spend their money in them; they have gone on and built their lines, and have got the control of the commerce of this country; and now, after having gone into this line of action as deep as we have, and after having caused as many American citizens as we have to expend their money in these railways, it perhaps is not a justifiable line of action for us to say that we will now build canals at the expense of the General Government to thwart the very men whom we have encouraged to build railroads.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a pretty good railroad argument.

Mr. MORGAN. A very good one; and then I will ask the honorable Senator from Illinois if we build canals for the purpose of thwarting the railways in their monopoly of the commerce and carrying trade of the country, why cannot we build railways for the same purpose? It comes to that. If we build a water-way to create competition with a railway, the very same necessity and the very same argument must be resorted to hereafter, and will be resorted to to get the Government of the United States to build railways in competition with private owners. We cannot stop once we have broken ground on this subject; and hence it is that I take the liberty of calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is a new departure in legislation, and one about which I think we should be extremely cautious. I would control the railways of this country by improving the navigable quality of waters that exist; but I do not think that we have the constitutional right to create new channels of navigation at the expense of the people of the United States, merely for the purpose of controlling those similar agencies for transportation which we have so largely encouraged at public expense heretofore.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, I gave notice before the Senator from Alabama took the floor that if debate was to be continued I should ask unanimous consent that the rule be established that remarks be confined to five minutes for each Senator, and in justice to the bill and the Senate I think that order had better be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator's request extend to the whole bill, or to the Hennepin Canal amendment?

Mr. McMILLAN. To that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to five minutes to each Senator on this amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and such is the order of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, when this amendment came up first I objected to it, because I thought it had no business on this bill, and I think the debate has developed that the Senate made a mistake in allowing it to be inserted as an amendment to the river and harbor bill. I stated then that very many important propositions of this sort were pending before the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, of which committee I am a member, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] being also one, the chairman being the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] and the other Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] I think, being also a member of it. We have had discussions there for months, and very able discussions, covering all questions that could possibly arise as to a great canal that was sought to be made across the States of Maryland and Delaware, connecting the Chesapeake Bay with the Delaware Bay. The Hennepin Canal was also before us as a part of that system; and simply because the Hennepin Canal bill went to the Committee on Commerce properly enough, and they saw fit to report favorably upon it, they have added it to this bill. They made a mistake, in my judgment, in attaching it to this bill, and the Senate will make a mistake if it allows it to be considered here. Questions relative to the jurisdiction to be surrendered were made before us; the action of the Legislatures of Maryland and Delaware was laid before us, which has not been done by the State of Illinois for the canal now proposed to be built. Hon. ROBERT M. MCLANE spent an hour or two with us, and made one of the ablest arguments on the constitutionality of the measure that I have ever heard. Other gentlemen made arguments against it.

In my judgment every measure of this character ought to be carefully considered in a separate bill. If you take up the Hennepin Canal on this bill it will be shown that the canal from Baltimore across the State of Delaware, connecting the waters of the Chesapeake with the Delaware Bay, is of infinitely greater importance than this, and you will be pressed for a canal across Florida to connect the great continental system of railway with the Gulf; the Niagara Ship-Canal will be pressed upon you; an interior line from Wilmington, North Carolina, or from Beaufort, South Carolina, will also be pressed. This is an entering-wedge flung in here with a small $100,000 appropriation that will be a very good thing for Chicago. As my colleague very well said, they have had difficulty in making the stream that runs through Chicago run into the lake, and they have endeavored to turn it back; they have substantially turned it backward; and this thing, if continued, will continue that sewer for the benefit of Chicago, and perhaps make it a great national canal on the present basis. The Erie Canal is not big enough; it is not doing half the work that the railroad along its side does to-day, not over one-third of it, but that is in the State of New York. She has made money by building it, and she is asked to make it bigger, and does not call on us.

Some years ago the men of the Northwest believed, and they urged it with every argument and memorial they could, that the great connection between the Mississippi and the lakes was by way of the Wisconsin River that runs up to Portage City and from there to connect with the Fox River by a canal a mile wide. We gave them a great grant of land, and in 1873 we gave them $300,000 in money; in 1874, $300,000; in 1875, $500,000; in 1876, $270,000; in 1878, $250,000; in 1879, $150,000; in 1880, $125 000; in 1881, $125,000; in 1882, $125,000; and so they have received $2,145,000 appropriated in the last nine years in addition to the land grant, and it is not yet quite in shape to be of any material benefit to commerce. That was the favored route, and it is a failure to-day; and this ought to be more carefully examined before any man can say it is going to be a success on a scale commensurate with the importance of the work and with the amount of money that will have to be expended; for, do not deceive yourselves, Senators; three or four millions now means twenty, twenty-five, or thirty millions when you come to make a canal of the proper dimensions. Why attach it to the river and harbor bill when other great measures of a similar character are being considered and are receiving proper consideration by themselves, and when this ought to be considered along with them, standing on its own merits, especially after the experience we have had with the Fox and Wisconsin Canal to connect the lakes and the Mississippi. There, with an expenditure in money of $2,145,000 in nine years, and land grants amounting to as much more perhaps, the work stands to-day a failure.

The Senate ought to be careful before it makes an adjunct like this, which is a mere entering-wedge, on its present basis of no great national value in the present condition of things, but one that can be made, and with money enough perhaps would become, a very important thing. The Senator from Illinois said he wanted the friends of this amendment to vote squarely for it or against it. I do not profess to be a friend of it. I propose to vote squarely against it as being improperly attached to this bill as an amendment, even if the Senate did so vote, and as being a mere nibble of what we shall ultimately have to pay, and not at all meeting what will be ultimately required. It is one of a series of measures that ought to be considered together with the Maryland and Chesapeake Canal running from the Chesapeake to the Delaware, the Florida Canal, the interior line from Wilmington, and the Niagara Ship-Canal, and all that class of questions. All these measures, with the constitutional questions involved in them, ought to be considered independently of any river and harbor bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I want to refer for a moment to the illustration used by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] as to the failure of the Fox and Wisconsin River Canal. As I understand him, he uses that as a strong argument against this proposition. Now, the fact is that the engineers told us before we began the Fox and Wisconsin Canal that it would cost something over $4,000,000 to build it and put it into operation. The Senator says we have spent something over two millions, and it is a dead failure.

Mr. BECK. Two millions in money, besides the land grants, amounting to as much more.

Mr. WINDOM. Four million dollars it was estimated to cost, irrespective of the land grants. Is it remarkable that an enterprise that was to cost four million or four and a half million dollars should be a failure when only a little over $2,000,000 has been expended on it? Suppose the Senator had undertaken to build a house that was to cost $10,000, and he had spent $5,000 on it and then proclaimed to the world that the house was a failure. Of course he could not use it until it was finished; of course the Fox River Canal is of no use until enough money is appropriated to finish it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I do not know how he would vote if here. I should vote "yea."

Mr. HAWLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MILLER, of California, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENDLETON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. MCDILL.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROVER. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GROOME. I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. MILLER.] In his absence I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Johnston,	Slater,
Anthony,	Davis of West Va.,	Jonas,	Vance,
Bayard,	Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Beck,	George,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Williams.
Butler,	Harris,	Rollins,
Camden,	Harrison,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Sherman,

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Davis of Illinois,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Gorman,	Pugh,

Garland,	Hoar,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck.
Groome,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,
Grover,	Kellogg,	Morrill,

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I ask that this amendment as agreed to may be reported, so that we may see precisely how the paragraphs connected with the Hennepin Canal will stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the committee's amendment as amended.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey, lay out, and construct a canal——

Mr. BUTLER. The words "and construct" should be stricken out. I meant to include them in my motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope they will not be stricken out. If those words are there by a vote of the Senate, they will not be stricken out without another vote of the Senate, I am very sure.

Mr. BUTLER. I will make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to hear the provision read as it is now amended. If there are further amendments needed we can consider them afterward.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. After the word "dollars," in line 1073, the proposition is to insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey, lay out, and construct a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, with a branch canal or feeder from the most practicable and convenient point on Rock River to the most practicable and convenient point on the main line of said canal. Said canal and said branch shall not be less than 70 feet wide at the water-line, and not less than 6 feet in depth of water, with locks not less than 150 feet in length and 21 feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden; and for that purpose the Secretary of War shall have power and authority, by engineers and agents employed by him, to enter upon any lands for the purpose of making the necessary preliminary examinations and surveys. The cost of construction, the annual cost of maintenance, and the economy of use of said canal when completed shall be estimated and accompany said surveys.

That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, by skillful engineers of the Army, all necessary examinations and surveys, and from them and surveys already made he shall determine and locate the route of said canal, with a due regard to the permanency of its construction and its greatest advantages for commercial purposes; and the said engineers shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of War a survey, map, and profile of said canal and branch when thus located, and before the work thereon shall be commenced.

That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to the canal connecting the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin with the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, and the branch thereof: Provided, That the State of Illinois shall have first surrendered to the United States the improvements made by said State on the Illinois River above Hennepin, and the canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and shall consent to the provisions of this act by act of her Legislature, before this act shall take effect and be operative.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator from South Carolina wishes to strike out a word.

Mr. LOGAN. What word does he propose to substitute?

Mr. BUTLER. I propose to strike out "and construct," after "survey."

Mr. LOGAN. What word does the Senator propose to put in to supply it? "Locate?"

Mr. BUTLER. "Survey and lay out" are enough.

Mr. LOGAN. "Locate" is a shorter word. "Lay out" and "locate" mean the same thing.

Mr. BUTLER. Say "survey and locate."

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the correction will be made. The Chair hears none, and the correction will be made. The amendment as amended reads:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey and locate, &c.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not say "survey and lay out?"

Mr. LOGAN. If you are going to do this for the purpose of building a canal some day, you want to locate it so that it will be permanently located where it is to be built.

Mr. ALLISON. "Lay out" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. LOGAN. Strike out "lay out" and leave "locate."

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. LOGAN. On line 1083 of the amendment I would suggest to strike out the word "six" in that line and insert "seven;" that is as to the depth of the canal.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objections so far as I am concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. That would make the depth of the canal not less than seven feet instead of "six." That will correspond with the other canal in depth.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the modification suggested by the Senator from Illinois will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. The last proviso, contained in lines 1200 to 1206, inclusive, should be stricken out now. It reads:

Provided, That the State of Illinois shall have first surrendered to the United States the improvements made by said State on the Illinois River above Hennepin, and the canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and shall consent to the provisions of this act by act of her Legislature, before this act shall take effect and be operative.

Mr. ALLISON. That ought to be stricken out now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves to strike out the proviso read by him. The question is on that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment as it stands, to come in after the last line of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from South Carolina:

And the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, by skillful engineers of the Army, a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and estimates of the cost of enlarging the same, so as to correspond in dimensions with the proposed canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River, and to report to the next session of Congress the cost of enlarging said canal, and of the construction of the canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River and the right of way therefor, and for the purpose of securing the early construction of an ample water-way for all purposes of commerce between the Mississippi River at or near Rock Island and the lakes at Chicago.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to have the first few lines of the amendment read. It has been amended, and I want to know how it reads—the first half dozen lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first few lines of the amendment as amended will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey and locate a canal from a point on the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is the word "construct" stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. The question is on the amendmendment of the Committee on Commerce as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the vote is taken, I wish to call the attention of the Senators who have opposed this measure because there was not sufficient information to the fact that this amendment now provides for all information necessary to ascertain the cost and the location of this canal, and for nothing else practically.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether this provides simply for a survey without committing the Government to construct the canal?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is all.

Mr. ALLISON. The whole question is remitted to Congress, to be decided, of course, after the survey is made.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is nothing that commits Congress to the construction of a canal, but only a provision for a survey for future consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator must construe the language of the amendment for himself. I do not understand that the Government is absolutely committed to appropriate money for this canal, any more than it would be to appropriate for a clerk that we had employed in the Treasury Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. There should be no doubt about that, because the purpose of the Senate has been to refrain from binding the Government to the construction of the canal until we should have a good survey and estimate of the whole plan. Now the Senator from Iowa intimates a doubt as to whether this commits the Government or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand why the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Connecticut are so especially anxious that Senators shall commit themselves one way or the other upon this question. This stands now exactly as every other survey stands in this bill and as every survey has stood from the beginning, with reference to the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well, that is all I desire to know, for that binds the Government not to expend another dollar unless it chooses to do so. I expect next winter—I hope next winter to be able to agree with the Senator from Iowa; but I am to-day not promising that I will build the canal. That is all I mean. I am asking that it be thoroughly surveyed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is an amendment on our tables offered by the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and I think it properly comes in at the end of this, so that the survey of the Hennepin Canal and that of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal may be placed on the same footing and in the same paragraph. I submit to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] who has charge of the amendment, the chairman of the Committee on Transportation Routes, if he had not better offer his amendment for a survey of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal now, as an amendment to this amendment, and let them both be acted on together.

Mr. HARRISON. The agreement made when this bill was taken up on the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce was that the amendments to the bill that were not amendments to the committee's amendments were to be deferred until the bill was gone through with, and then be offered. I supposed the amendment which was submitted for the survey of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal would properly come in after the amendments of the Committee on Commerce were disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It would be just as proper now, in my opinion, as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Indiana is right in regard to the understanding agreed to by unanimous consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. According to the rule heretofore prevailing in respect to amendments to appropriation bills, the amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia would not now be in order. It will be in order so soon as the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Illinois has just offered a similar amendment, and it has been acted on and added to this amendment, and no objection was made on the part of the committee or anybody else. Here are two canals for which surveys are to be made, and they stand, in my opinion, upon an equal footing. Both ought to be made, and if one is rejected the other ought to be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia perhaps did not understand the Chair. The Chair said that so soon as the committee amendments have been acted on the amendment suggested by him will be in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the Chair to that effect, but here is a committee amendment. As the Chair will readily see, what we are acting on now is a committee amendment, not a part of the bill yet; it is no more a part of the bill than the amendment I hold in my hand, except that the Committee on Commerce has reported it. What I believe to be proper is that this amendment should be added to the committee amendment, and I see no reason why it is not in order, and if it is to be ruled out let us know it now; do not let us wait until this committee amendment has been adopted and let one section of country have a survey for a canal and another section afterward be defeated by some cause or other not known to us now. One is just as meritorious as the other.

Mr. McMILLAN. This amendment pertains to a different subject-matter; it is not perfecting the text of the amendment of the Committee on Commerce in any way. It is an entirely different thing, a foreign matter. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina was one perfecting the text of the committee's amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Allow me to ask a question. Is the Senator in favor of the survey of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, or not? Is he for it, or against it?

Mr. McMILLAN. I will answer the Senator when we come to consider that amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I supposed that.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not in order now under the rule established by the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I supposed possibly that would be the answer. The Senator is very much in favor of one, and possibly against the other. I think these two canals ought to stand or fall together. If the surveys are to be ordered for one, they ought to be ordered for the other; and what the Senator has just said is an intimation that he is in favor of the survey and location of the Hennepin Canal but opposed to this other great national work, much more national in its character than that which has already been added to the bill.

I submit to the Chair whether it is not in order to amend the committee's amendment now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any amendment that modifies or changes a committee amendment is in order at this time and must be offered while that amendment is under consideration, if at all. An amendment to a committee amendment, upon a totally different subject, that does not modify or change the text of the committee amendment, according to the rule under which the Chair understands the Senate to have been acting, should properly be offered after the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then, Mr. President, I understand that if the amendment I now speak of in relation to the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal should not be in order at this time, (and upon reflection I am inclined to agree with the Chair on that point,) then in the Senate it would be in order to strike out or to disagree to this committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I wish to say to the friends of the Hennepin Canal and all others here that this is an amendment that I believe of as much importance as any possibly could be in the way of the survey and location of a great national work, and I hope when it is offered that even the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will have no objection to it. He ought not to have any.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from West Virginia will understand that the chairman of the committee has expressed no opinion one way or the other upon his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope he will have an opinion for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce as amended.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have endeavored to follow the amendment through all its various changes. For fear I have not succeeded, I ask that it be read as we are now to vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will read the amendment as amended.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to survey and locate a canal from a point on the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, by the most practicable and convenient route, to the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, with a branch canal or feeder from the most practicable and convenient point on Rock River to the most practicable and convenient point on the main line of said canal. Said canal and said branch shall not be less than 70 feet wide at the water-line, and not less than 7 feet in depth of water, with locks not less than 150 feet in length and 21 feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least 280 tons burden; and for that purpose the Secretary of War shall have power and authority, by engineers and agents employed by him, to enter upon any lands for the purpose of making the necessary preliminary examinations and surveys. The cost of construction, the annual cost of maintenance, and the economy of use of said canal when completed, shall be estimated and accompany said surveys.

That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, by skillful engineers of the Army, all necessary examinations and surveys, and from them and surveys already made he shall determine and locate the route of said canal, with a due regard to the permanency of its construction and its greatest advantages for commercial purposes; and the said engineers shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of War a survey, map, and profile of said canal and branch when thus located, and before the work thereon shall be commenced. That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to the canal connecting the Illinois River at or near the town of Hennepin with the Mississippi River at or above the city of Rock Island, and the branch thereof.

And the Secretary of War shall cause to be made by skillful engineers of the Army a survey of the Illinois and Michigan Canal connecting the Illinois River with Lake Michigan at Chicago, and estimates of the cost of enlarging the same so as to correspond in dimensions with the proposed canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River, and to report to the next session of Congress the cost of enlarging said canal, and of the construction of the canal between Hennepin and the Mississippi River and the right of way therefor, and for the purpose of securing the early construction of an ample water-way for all purposes of commerce between the Mississippi River at or near Rock Island and the lakes at Chicago.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to strike out, after the word "located," in line 1106, the words "and before the work thereon shall be commenced."

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; there is no objection to that. I think those words ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is so modified.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to strike out the words "and locate," in line 1075, and the words "and locate the route of said canal," in lines 1101 and 1102. The one amendment follows upon the other, and I make the motion to strike out for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that if there can be any committal of the Congress of the United States in advance to making any work these words in the amendment commit Congress as much as the provision as originally reported. If it be intended only to make a survey, to give to Congress information, I submit that it is not necessary to put in the amendment the words "and locate" in the first place or in the second place, and that the provision that the Secretary of War shall locate the canal and there shall be filed in his office profiles of the location, commit Congress as entirely to prosecute the construction of the line on that location as if we passed the whole of the original amendment of the committee and appropriated only $100,000 for the survey. I have no disposition to elaborate that view. It seems to me too plain for elaboration.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to say one word in response to the Senator from Ohio. The exact difficulty under which we have labored here to-day and yesterday has been that we had not a definite location of the canal so as to ascertain its cost, and we have been told that what Congress should do before it committed itself to an appropriation for the construction was to procure a location of the canal so as to give the dimensions and the cost of the work. I submit to my friend from Ohio that these words ought to be left in for the very purpose of enabling Congress in future to have the exact estimate of the cost of the work as located, so that anybody can see what the location is.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire if all the amendments are not made by unanimous consent only? As I understand the parliamentary position, an amendment has been adopted to the committee's amendment. That amendment is not yet put on the bill, but it has been substituted for the committee's amendment. That being true, that amendment is not capable of other amendment after the vote, under the rule expressly laid down in Jefferson's Manual.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment adopted to the committee's amendment is not a substitute. It modifies, as the Chair understands, various portions of the committee's amendment, but it is not in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HOAR. This amendment, then, is to a part of the committee's amendment for which a substitute has not been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As to that the Chair is not advised.

Mr. HOAR. It depends on the answer to that question whether the point is well taken.

Mr. SEWELL. I should construe the word "locate" here as simply referring to a located survey, to the profile of the survey, and that it does not commit the Government to the construction of the work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk that where the word "locate," proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Ohio, first appears, it has been inserted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. Then it requires unanimous consent to strike it out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the second instance it appears in the text of the original amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does the Chair decide that the amendment I have offered is out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the first instance the Chair would be bound so to hold. Where that word first appears it has been inserted by the action of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then after the word "surveys," in line 1100, I move to strike out to the end of the paragraph, as follows:

And from them and surveys already made he shall determine and locate the route of said canal, with a due regard to the permanency of its construction and its greatest advantages for commercial purposes, and the said engineers shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of War a survey, map, and profile of said canal and branch when thus located.

So as to make the paragraph read:

That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made by skillful engineers of the Army all necessary examinations and surveys.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of my colleague to the fact that the whole of the paragraph, from line 1098 to line 1106 inclusive, is unnecessary, because it is already provided for in a previous clause, which reads:

And for that purpose the Secretary of War shall have power and authority, by engineers and agents employed by him, to enter upon any lands for the purpose of making the necessary preliminary examinations and surveys.

The motion to strike out should therefore extend to the whole paragraph, because the first part of it is covered by the words I have just read.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no objection to extending my motion to the whole paragraph. I cast my eye hastily over it. My object is to prevent a provision for a permanent appropriation for the construction of the canal. I accept my colleague's suggestion, and move to strike out the whole paragraph, after the word "branch," in line 1097, to and including the word "located," in line 1106. I have no disposition to say anything more. What I said before applies as distinctly to this amendment as to the one which was ruled out of order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] The bill as it now stands provides merely for a survey of the canal, a located survey, as was remarked by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SEWELL.] That is, the engineers are to determine the precise location of the canal with a due regard to the permanency of its construction and its greatest advantages for commercial purposes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will my friend from Minnesota allow me to call his attention to the first portion of the amendment, commencing at line 1074? It seems to me that that part of the amendment provides for the survey and location, and that the portion proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Ohio is nothing more than a repetition.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is more than a repetition, because that paragraph prescribes modifications to these engineers as to the location which they shall make of the canal. It provides that in their survey they shall "locate the route of the said canal with a due regard to the permanency of its construction and its greatest advantages for commercial purposes." In addition to that the paragraph provides that the engineers "shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of War a survey, map, and profile of said canal and branch." They are not authorized or directed by the preceding paragraph to file any plan of the survey at all, and the directions in this paragraph are all of them useful and some of them essentially necessary to a complete survey, so that Congress may have the official information of the results of their action. There is nothing in the paragraph that can affect this question injuriously, and the official record and return of their surveys and the filing of them in the office of the Secretary of War are provided for in the paragraph.

Mr. PENDLETON. If it is the intention of the Senate at this time to secure the official information for the location and construction of that route, I submit that we only need go on with the survey. The surveys are all to be made and completed for the several routes proposed before the location can be determined. It is not usual to send a corps of surveyors into the field not only to examine all the routes but to locate that which is most practicable. It will take some time to make these surveys. I submit that the only necessity now is to order the surveys to be made, and when they shall be made and are examined by Congress, Congress can either itself determine upon the location or commit that subject to other authority.

We were told just now by the Senator from Iowa that the purpose of the whole amendment is to procure information, and he begged to call the attention of gentlemen who had opposed the committee's amendment to the fact that now the thing was reduced to the single point of giving to Congress information. I submit that he is in error. I submit that it is not only to get information for Congress but it is to take the initial step in the construction of this work.

I repeat what I said before: if there is any committal by a law of Congress ordering a survey, location, and construction, it is effected by the use of the words "survey and location." If we are now to determine on these surveys without the intervention of Congress in the location of the canal, we shall be told at the next session or some other session that we have commenced the work.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not so understand the question. Suppose it should turn out that there are three different routes to be surveyed, and these profiles and examinations and calculations are made with reference to all of them, do we not want more than that? Do we not want a location of the canal by men competent to locate it with reference to every question connected with it? Congress is not bound to build the canal by the mere location of it. There is no question about that. The Senator from Ohio does not, for one, wish to be committed, and I shall not commit him, to vote to construct the work because the word "locate" is in the provision ordering the survey. I do not think it binds Congress in the slightest degree, if Congress does not choose to go on with this work after it has the location and the cost and dimensions in detail.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator from Iowa consent to substitute for the word "locate" the words "recommend the location of?" I should be willing then to concur with him; but if the canal is to be located instead of recommending its location, that is another question.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEWELL. I suggest that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio be modified by striking out, in line 1101, the words "and locate the" before "route," and to insert "a located;" so as to read:

And from them and surveys already made he shall determine a located route.

So as simply to make a permanent estimate on the work.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator means to say that they shall determine the location or the route.

Mr. SEWELL. That is perhaps as well.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I submit to the Senator from New Jersey that we shall have an estimate on any route that is surveyed, and let Congress in the end select the route on which the canal is to be built.

Mr. SEWELL. I take it for granted that the engineers sent out on a great important work like this will make half a dozen preliminary surveys, and then they will submit them to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War will select, with their advice, the best and cheapest line, and that is the one to be located.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But ought not Congress to have the information in regard to all the lines surveyed, so that Congress may select the route, and not the Secretary of War?

Mr. SEWELL. Congress might have the information, but I think the engineers are the most competent to make a selection of the route. The idea I wish to convey is that by using the term "location" in the sense in which it is employed here, it does not bind the Government to build the canal at all. It is simply a technical term.

Mr. ALLISON. How can Congress locate it, I submit to my friend from West Virginia? By sending a joint committee of both Houses out there to look over the engineers?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no mistake about that. Congress can no more locate that canal than it could locate a canal across the Isthmus. It must be done by engineers.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask my friend can the engineers or the Secretary of War build a canal unless Congress instructs them to do it and determines what route shall be taken? Who gives them the discretion to do it? The Secretary of War cannot do it any more than Congress can, and not so well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Commerce as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 1208, before the word "million," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" and in the same line, after the word "million," to strike out "one hundred and twenty-three thousand;" so as to read:

Improving Mississippi River: That the sum of $5,000,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the head of the passes to Cairo, including the harbors of New Orleans, Natchez, Vicksburgh, Memphis, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "Memphis," in line 1214, to insert "a lock at the mouth of Bayou Plaquemine, Louisiana," and in line 1218, after the words "Alton Harbor," to insert "on which a sum not exceeding $35,000 shall be expended;" so as to read:

A lock at the mouth of Bayou Plaquemine, Louisiana, and the rectification of the Red and the Atchafalaya Rivers at the mouth of Red River; $600,000 from Cairo to the Illinois River, including Alton Harbor, on which a sum not exceeding $35,000 shall be expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1240.

Mr. McMILLAN. In line 1236 the word "commission" should be stricken out and the words "Secretary of War" inserted, and in the following line the words "their judgment" should be changed to "the judgment of the commission;" so as to make the proviso read:

That the Secretary of War is authorized to repair and build levees if in the judgment of the commission it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me ask the Senator from Minnesota what that means?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Secretary of War is to do the work; it is to be done by the War Department, but it is to be done upon the judgment of the Mississippi River commission.

Mr. ALLISON. That is to say, if they want to use $6,000,000 or $5,000,000 to repair levees they can do so.

Mr. McMILLAN. So far as my amendment is concerned it puts the execution of the work upon the Secretary of War, under the discretion and in the judgment of the Mississippi River commission.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to it, I only want to call the attention of my constitutional friends on the other side to it.

Mr. GARLAND. That is all constitutional.

Mr. HARRISON. It is proposed that the gentlemen of the Mississippi River commission shall not be charged with the expense, but it is to be done under the Secretary of War.

Mr. McMILLAN. The amendment I have proposed to the provision as it came from the House is designed to make that modification. I have offered no other amendment to the text of the bill as it came from the House in this respect.

Mr. JONAS. I desire some explanation of this amendment. I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether this is an amendment of the committee or is it an amendment he now proposes on the floor?

Mr. McMILLAN. This I understand to be at the suggestion of members of the committee in accordance with the text of the bill in other portions, and at the suggestion of the Mississippi River commission itself. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] is aware of that suggestion.

Mr. JONAS. I am informed that the amendment was never adopted in committee, and as it is not in the printed bill it is difficult to see exactly how it changes the effect of the bill. As I understand it, the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the proviso takes away from the commission the discretion to repair and to build levees if in their judgment it is a part of their plan, and confers it upon the Secretary of War, while all the rest of the work is left to the judgment of the Mississippi River commission according to their plan.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is only to make that portion of the bill correspond with the other provisions, if the Senator will observe the text.

Mr. CONGER. The committee have a letter from General Comstock, a member of the commission, recommending that the work be done as the amendment provides, by the Secretary of War, upon the judgment and direction of the commission. This amendment is submitted at the request of members of the commission.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to raise a question of order. This is an amendment now offered by the chairman of the committee to the second proviso. It was agreed that the committee's amendments should come in first, but where a committee amendment is adopted it will not subsequently be open to amendment. I offered an amendment and submitted it to the committee, striking out both these provisos and substituting another proviso for them. Will the adoption of the pending amendment interfere with my amendment, or must I now offer it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator raise the question of order as to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FRYE. No; I want to know whether, under the rule which the Senate adopted, it is necessary for me now to propose my amendment to these provisos?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By no means is it. When the amendments of the committee have been acted on the bill will be as in Committee of the Whole open to amendment, and the Senator from Maine will have an opportunity to offer such amendments as he may see proper then.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I inquire further, if the amendments of the committee are adopted, will it be in order in Committee of the Whole afterward to amend the committee amendments? I understand it will not be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; an amendment of the committee already adopted cannot be changed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is what I supposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But an amendment to the text of the bill will be in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, yes; I agree with the Chair in that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Or a part of the text, and perhaps a whole amendment adopted in committee, it would be in order to amend.

Mr. FERRY. When the question is reached in the Senate on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole an opportunity will then be afforded to a Senator if he desires to move to amend any clause amended in the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the Senate, of course.

Mr. JONAS. I ask that the proviso be read as it is proposed to be amended.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That the Secretary of War is authorized to repair and build levees, if in the judgment of the commission it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1248.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this point in the bill is the end of the provision in regard to the Mississippi River commission, although the bill as it is printed does not indicate it. What follows is a new paragraph relating to other matters than the Mississippi River commission.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1273.

Mr. MCMILLAN. In line 1269 the words "they are" should be stricken out and "he is" inserted, so as to read:

And he is hereby authorized to expend so much of said balance as may be necessary, &c.

That refers to the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War is the antecedent of the pronoun "he."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 1288.

Mr. CONGER. In line 1286 I move to strike out the words "or vessels" after the word "vessel," changing "vessel" to "vessels," and to insert the words "boats, dredges, craft, or other water craft;" so as to read:

That no tolls or operating charges whatsoever shall be levied or collected upon any vessels, boats, dredges, craft, or other water craft passing through any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation belonging to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The next paragraph of the bill should be stricken out. It was stricken out by the committee, and appears in the printed bill by mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paragraph proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The PRINCIPAL LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out from line 1289 to line 1294, inclusive, in the following words:

That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War to expend the money appropriated by the act approved March 3, 1879, in the construction of a harbor of refuge at Port Orford, on the Pacific coast, if in his opinion it be deemed judicious to do so.

Mr. GROVER. I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment striking out that paragraph. The harbor of refuge at Port Orford was located by a board of engineers authorized by an act of Congress, and an appropriation of $150,000 was made to begin the improvement. A question as to the proper location was raised, and it was resubmitted to the board. The board a second time located the harbor of refuge in the same place. This paragraph extends the small amount of appropriation formerly made for the beginning of the work. It is greatly desired by the people of Southern Oregon. I ask for a vote upon the question whether it shall be stricken out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to say, as I remarked before, that this portion of the bill was stricken out by the committee of the Senate, and it should have so appeared in the print of the bill.

The appropriation in regard to Port Orford stands in this way: in 1879 there was an appropriation of $150,000 made for the inauguration of a harbor of refuge on the Pacific coast. There was no location of it, and the Secretary of War was directed to submit that matter to the board of engineers. The money could not be appropriated until the harbor of refuge should be located at some particular point, and of course that is done with the approval of the Secretary of War. There was some examination and survey in regard to the location of the harbor of refuge. The engineers differ entirely, first, as to the necessity of the harbor of refuge, declaring that the safest course for vessels to pursue upon that coast in case of a storm is to go to sea; and if a harbor of refuge is to be located between the straits and California they differ as to the location of that harbor of refuge. The point has never been determined.

This paragraph in the language which is used here settles the location and determines it to be at Port Orford, without the approval of the Secretary of War, and without the concurrence of the engineers on the Pacific coast. The Committee on Commerce did not regard it as proper to make a fixed location for the harbor of refuge. It is the commencement of a very important improvement, and wherever the harbor of refuge is to be located, it should be the very best place. The appropriations for that coast and for that portion of the country will necessarily be very large, and for this particular improvement of a harbor of refuge it will be a very large amount, and should be very judiciously and carefully expended.

The location of the harbor of refuge is a matter of vital importance which should have the concurrence of the board of engineers under the War Department, and the approval of the Secretary of War. By striking out the paragraph it does not take away the appropriation; the appropriation still stands; the act of 1879 remains in force, and the determination can be made at any time now or in the future.

It is therefore the judgment of the committee that the matter should remain as it is until the engineers who are familiar with the coast and with the interests of navigation there shall determine the question of location.

Mr. GROVER. I think the Senator is not correct. It is not true that the engineers concluded that Port Orford was not a proper place, or that the necessity for a harbor of refuge on the Pacific coast was not such that it should be constructed. From San Francisco to Puget Sound there is not a single harbor of refuge, and all ship-masters and all interested in the commerce of the Pacific coast consider that it is an absolute necessity to have a harbor of refuge in that quarter. The engineers did not determine, as I read their report, that there was no necessity for a harbor of refuge, but they thought there was a necessity for it. Every man engaged in the commerce of the Pacific coast knows that there is a great necessity for a harbor of refuge there to prevent the loss of ships. They declare earnestly that there is a necessity for this harbor of refuge. As to what the Secretary of War may say, I do not understand that the Secretary of War has at any time done anything but report the proceedings of the engineers without saying a word against their determination.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not know whether I understood the Senator from Oregon as saying that I had expressed the opinion that the Secretary of War had decided against the necessity or propriety of a harbor of refuge on that coast. If so, he is mistaken; I did not so state. I said there was a difference of opinion among the engineers of that coast as to the necessity of a harbor of refuge.

Mr. GROVER. A majority of the engineers twice have declared that that was a proper place and that there was a necessity for it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. There can be no question that a harbor of refuge between the port of San Francisco and Puget Sound is a necessity to commerce for the safety of vessels. Whether a board of Army engineers are the most competent persons to decide as to the necessity of a harbor of refuge, and whether it is better for vessels seeking safety on that coast to go into a harbor of refuge or to go to sea, of course I am not able to decide; but if the question were left to a board of officers of the Navy I am sure that they would decide in accordance with the opinion of the more intelligent captains and officers of the merchant marine.

I believe that every ship-owner and every ship-master on the Pacific coast acknowledges the necessity for some such harbor as is proposed by this legislation, and I believe that the better opinion is that Port Orford is the proper place for it. I think it would be better to allow the bill to stand as it came from the House, with perhaps a slight amendment which I believe the Senator from Oregon is ready to accept if the recommendation of the committee be not concurred in.

Mr. FARLEY. It is proper that I should make a statement in reference to this amendment, being a member of the Committee on Commerce, which considered the matter. It was decided in the committee to strike this paragraph from the bill. I have information in reference to the proposed harbor of refuge at Port Orford. The Chief of Engineers, General Wright, gives it as his opinion that no harbor of refuge is needed upon that coast, and he comes to that conclusion from an examination of the report of the engineers and from his own investigation of the coast between San Francisco and the Straits of Fuca. He says that all of the large vessels go into deep water in the case of a storm, and he did not think it necessary to build a harbor of refuge at that point.

Port Orford and Trinidad are the two points which were considered by the board of engineers appointed under the act making the appropriation in 1879. There were two reports, one made by Colonel Mendell and another member of the board, and one made by Colonel Williamson.

Colonel Williamson's report was in favor of Trinidad. Colonel Mendell and the other member of the board reported in favor of Port Orford and estimated the probable cost of building a harbor of refuge at either one of those points. At Port Orford the estimate of Colonel Mendell was that it would cost between eight million and nine million dollars to build a harbor of refuge at that point. Such is the report of a majority of the board. Colonel Williamson's report in favor of Trinidad was that it would cost between three million and four million dollars to build a harbor of refuge at that point. General Wright, however, said that as between the two points, if a harbor of refuge has to be built, Port Orford is the preferable locality. That is his statement. In a conversation with Colonel Mendell himself, who made the majority report, he said that he doubts the propriety or policy of building a harbor of refuge on that coast between San Francisco and the Straits of Fuca.

I have only to say so far as the action of the committee is concerned, that while I voted in committee against striking this paragraph from the bill, I feel it to be my duty now to stand by the committee in the recommendation which they make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 25, noes not counted.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in the appropriations for "examinations or surveys, or both," after line 1334, to insert:

Pensaukin Creek, Camden and Burlington Counties, New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1338, to insert:

Piankatank River, Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1354, to insert:

The channel of the Saint John's River at its entrance into and exit out of Lake Monoc, and between Lake George and Lake Monoc, for straightening and improving the navigation of said river between the said lakes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to a clerical error in the name of the lake. It is printed "Monoc." It should be Lake Monroe. I ask that that correction be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The word occurs in two places.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will correct it in both places. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, after line 1366, to insert:

Resurvey of the breakwater at the mouth of Saco River, Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1374, to insert:

Madison Harbor, in the State of Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1375, to insert:

Duck Island Harbor, in the State of Connecticut, with a view to the construction of a short breakwater for a harbor of refuge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1379, to insert:

Harbor at Cross Village, Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out line 1382, as follows:

Salmon River Cove, Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1385, to insert:

Pawtucket River, Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1387, to insert:

Pawtuxet Harbor, Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1388, to insert:

Bissell's Cove, Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1397, to insert:

For a channel inside the shoals along the coast of Florida, from Cedar Keys to Clear-water Harbor and Tampa, Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1409, before the word "Carthage," to strike out "between" and insert "above;" and after "Carthage," to strike out "and Edinburgh;" so as to read:

Pearl River, Mississippi, above Carthage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1446, after "Lewis," to insert "Humptulup;" so as to read:

The Lewis, Humptulup, and Dawamish Rivers, Washington Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1447, to insert:

Sebewaing Harbor, Michigan, resurvey, to obtain 12 feet of water in channel from Saginaw Bay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1453, to insert:

The lakes near the headwaters of the Cannon River in Rice and Le Sueur Counties, Minnesota, with a view to adding the same to the reservoir system of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1501, to insert:

Clubfoot, Harlow, and Newport Rivers, North Carolina, on line of inland navigation to Beaufort Harbor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert after line 1510:

Alligator River, North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert after line 1511:

Black River, North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "county," in line 1513, to strike out "and New River, in Onslow County;" so as to make the clause read:

Sound between Morehead City, in Carteret County, North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert after line 1514:

Town Creek, Beaufort County, North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1517, to insert:

Bay River, North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, after line 1522:

Cape Fear River above Fayetteville, North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1526, to insert:

Roanoke River, North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment, was after line 1534, to insert:

Dividing Creek, Talbot County, Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1537, to insert:

Pecatonica River, from Argyle to Wayne, La Fayette County, Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, after line 1539:

For the extension and completion of the breakwater, near the third, in Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire, connecting Goat Island and New Castle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1542, to insert:

At and near the mouth of the Great Bay, so called, with a view to increasing the depth of the flow of water and improvement of the navigation of the Piscataqua River and its tributaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1546, to insert:

Steele's Bayou, in Mississippi, from its mouth to Swan Lake, in Washington County.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1548, to insert:

The Yazoo Pass, including examination and estimate as to cost and feasibility of putting a lock so as to connect the pass with the Mississippi River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1551, to insert:

Roebuck Lake, a tributary of the Yazoo River, in Le Flore County, Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1553, to insert:

Survey of Black River from its mouth to Trinity, Louisiana, with a view of improving its navigation by shortening its channel by cut-off.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1556, to insert:

Red River, Louisiana, from the Atchafalaya to Fulton, Arkansas, including relieving the town of Alexandria from the encroachments of the river, removing snags from Cane River, and closing the outlet of the river known as "Sale and Murphy Canal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1561, to insert:

Bayou Pierre, Louisiana, by removing raft therefrom.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1563, to insert:

Loggy Bayou, Lake Bisteneau, and the Dorcheat, Louisiana; Cane River, Louisiana; and Petit Anse Bayou, Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1566, to insert:

To make such survey and report as to the cost of placing locks and dams on the Cumberland River from Nashville, Tennessee, to the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, in Kentucky, as in the opinion of the Secretary of War is necessary to complete the examination and report of said river; said report to be, first, as to the practicability of the work; second, its probable cost from Nashville to the Kentucky line; third, the cost from the Kentucky line to the Cincinnati Southern Railroad; fourth, the cost of locking and damming so as to improve Smith's Shoals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1579, to insert:

The river Brandywine from its mouth to the Market street bridge in the city of Wilmington, Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. FRYE. After the word "of," in line 1233, I move to strike out the following provisos:

Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands by overflows: Provided, however, That the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if, in their judgment, it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended to repair or build levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands by overflow, or for any other purpose whatever except as a means of deepening the channels or improving the navigation of the said rivers.

I desire to say only a word, for I have no anxiety to enter into any discussion of this question. The Senate, through the report of a committee having this matter in charge, decided in favor of an expenditure of $5,000,000 on the Mississippi River and $1,000,000 on the Missouri River. After a long discussion that committee came to an agreement that the proviso which I have moved to substitute should be adopted. It was adopted by the committee; it was reported to the Senate, and at least twenty gentlemen came to me afterward and urged me to consent to a proviso such as is contained in this bill, which does not read very differently, I admit, but which bears a construction that in my judgment would be an invitation to build levees with this appropriation. I objected to any change of that proviso and it finally was consented to unanimously by the Senate, and the bill passed unanimously with the identical proviso in it which I have moved to substitute for these.

I believe that that proviso is entirely right. I believe it is the only one which will satisfy the people of this country that this is not an entering upon building levees and reclaiming lands on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. I see the language here is not much different, but it is the identical language which I was urged by divers gentlemen, both in committee and in the Senate, after it was reported by the committee, to consent to insert. In my judgment, if the commissioners are desirous themselves to enter upon the levee system to reclaim lands, it may be considered a permission to them to do so. At any rate, they will not be bound under it as they would be bound by the proviso which I propose, which is that not a dollar shall be expended on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers except for deepening the channel and improving navigation.

Sir, in appropriating $6,000,000, $8,000,000, $10,000,000, or $20,000,000, as will be done hereafter to the improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, the people of this country never will consent to it unless they understand that the money is to be applied and expended for one single purpose, and that is to enable ships to sail upon the rivers and commerce to be floated upon the rivers, and they will not consent to it if it be under suspicion that the money is to be taken from that purpose and appropriated to the purpose of reclaiming lands. They hold to the doctrine and believe in it that those great rivers should have expended upon them every dollar necessary to improve them for the purposes of navigation. They hold with equal strength to the doctrine that there is no obligation on the part of the United States to recover any lands up and down the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers for the benefit of the States or for the benefit of the owners.

I desire to say nothing more except to ask the Senate to now adopt as an amendment to this bill the identical language the Senate unanimously put into the Mississippi River improvement bill when it was before them for consideration as a separate measure from the river and harbor bill.

Mr. JONAS. Before making a few remarks upon the amendment, I ask that the Secretary read the provisos that it is proposed to strike out, and the proviso which the Senator from Maine proposes to insert.

The Acting Secretary read Mr. FRYE's amendment.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, the Senate will understand from the reading of the provisos in the bill and the substitute offered by the Senator from Maine that no substantial change is proposed by his amendment. The Senator says very truly that the amendment offered by him was the proviso in the bill passed by the Senate. But that bill has never passed the House and still lays on the Speaker's table, or has probably been indefinitely postponed. We come now to a consideration of a House bill. This bill has been sent to us from the House, and the provisos were recommended by the Committee on Commerce of the House and adopted by the House, as the Journals will show, by a very large majority of the members of that body.

There can be no reason for our making the change asked. This is not the Senate bill in any sense or respect, and I can see no reason why the Senate proviso should be put upon the House bill, after that bill has been reported to the Senate by our Committee on Commerce.

What stronger prohibition could be conveyed by language than is contained in the first clause of the proviso against repairing or building levees for the sole purpose of reclaiming lands from overflow? The proviso says that no portion of this appropriation shall be expended for that purpose; that not a dollar of this appropriation shall be expended for the purpose of repairing or building levees, for reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands by overflow. That language is certainly quite as strong as the language employed in the proviso offered by the Senator from Maine. I do not propose to reopen the discussion of this question.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will allow me, it is precisely the same down to that point. It is the second proviso that I complain of.

Mr. JONAS. The next proviso, as amended, reads:

That the Secretary of War is authorized to repair and build levees, if, in the judgment of the commission, it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river and to deepen the channel.

In other language, the same power is conferred upon the commission in the proviso offered as an amendment by the Senator from Maine, which provides that none of this money shall be expended in the building of levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands or preventing injury to lands by overflow, but only as a means of deepening the channel or improving the navigation of the river.

Congress has substantially adopted the plans of the commission. We created the commission; we intrusted them with certain duties and powers. We made an appropriation last year for the purpose of enabling them to commence the work which was placed in their hands. We propose now to appropriate five millions. For what purpose? For the purpose of enabling the Mississippi River commission to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River, to give ease and safety to the navigation of that river according to the plans and specifications which they have submitted to Congress.

I know it has been argued by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON,] who was lately a member of the commission, that the commission do not include building levees as a portion of their plans, that they have not recommended levee building for the improvement of the navigation of the river, or for the purpose of deepening its channel. I differ with him about that. I believe that they do say that the building of levees will be necessary in some respects to the plan of their work and the attainment of the ends which they have in view, and with which we have charged them. They are expressly inhibited by the first part of this proviso from using a dollar for any other purpose, from building levees for the purpose of protecting any lands, either public or private, from overflow, from building levees for the purpose of reclaiming lands; and they are only authorized, as they are authorized in the amendment offered by the Senator, but in language more broad and less liable to misconstruction, to build levees, if necessary, as a part of their plans for improving the river, and affording ease and safety to its navigation and commerce and to deepen its channel.

The Mississippi River commission have made estimates for this purpose, which have been sent to Congress, and which have been recognized in this bill. Their first estimate included $1,010,000 for the purpose of closing existing gaps in the levees, and a subsequent estimate sent to the Senate with the recommendation of the President asked for $1,010,000 more for the same purpose, on account of the damages which had been caused to the levees by the recent overflow. However they may regard the levee system as a part of their work of channel improvement, there is no question that they consider it necessary that the present gaps in the levees should be closed, in order that they may be able to construct and maintain the works of channel improvement which they recommend as in their report.

Changing the provisos of this bill and inserting the Senator's amendment, while it changes in no sense the meaning of Congress, while it in no sense changes the meaning of this bill, while it would change in no sense the meaning of this appropriation and the instruction as to its uses, would be simply amending a House bill in order to make it conform to a Senate bill which we sent to the House and which the House did not pass. We might as well insist on striking out this provision from the river and harbor bill and insist upon the House passing the bill which the Senate sent them as to insist that this appropriation shall be in the same terms and in the same language and with all the provisions that were contained in the Senate bill which the House thought proper, as it had a right to do, to ignore.

There is no substantial difference. If there is any difference at all it is in favor of the proviso in the bill as it came from the House. Its language is plain; it cannot be misunderstood, and it will not be unacceptable to the people of this country. It was adopted by an enormous majority after discussion in that branch of Congress in which the great public sentiment is more immediately and fully represented.

I have no fear but that this appropriation will be popular with the whole country, it being in accordance with the estimates of the Mississippi River commission, to whom the instruction was given to devise plans and submit them to Congress, and I am equally convinced the whole country will be satisfied with these provisos. I am convinced that they will be satisfactory to those who oppose the appropriation of money for the purpose of building levees and reclaiming land and preventing overflows, and at least partially satisfactory to those who believe that levees are a necessary and essential part of channel improvement, both for the purpose of deepening the channel and maintaining the easy and safe navigation of the river, and who also believe that the construction of such works, at the same time that they will carry out the design and purpose of this appropriation, will afford some incidental protection to the people who live upon the banks of that great river, and in some measure protect them from the consequences of its annual overflow.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to have the bill finished to-night, and of course it is to the convenience of all to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate, nor do I desire to open any lengthy discussion which, as the Senator from Maine has stated, we had at length on the bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River when the question was presented here as an independent measure.

If it be true, as the Senator from Louisiana says, that the phraseology contained in the bill as it comes to us from the House is not essentially different from that proposed by the Senator from Maine in his amendment, and which received the unanimous concurrence of the Senate, then I ask what objection can there be to incorporating in the bill the language which the Senate has once set its approval to by a unanimous vote?

The first proviso in the bill as it came from the House is a very distinct, clear, and emphatic enunciation of the purposes for which this money is to be used. If it stood alone there would be no doubt in the mind of any member of the commission as to how they were authorized to expend it. But the very fact that it was thought necessary in the House to add the second proviso, which contains affirmative authority to build levees and which incorporates the easily-misunderstood terms "ease and safety to the navigation," is the clearest possible indication that those who favor the levee system suppose there is in that provision something that abates from the force of the first proviso and that it enlarges the discretion of the members of the Mississippi River commission in that connection.

I feel that our enunciation on this subject should be clear. I have pleaded for that from the beginning. If in the opinion of Congress levees ought to be built, then we ought to go at it in a bold, manly fashion and build them. If in the opinion of Congress they ought not to be built by money expended from the national Treasury, then we ought to say so quite as emphatically, and not leave it a matter of doubt and uncertainty in the minds of the commission.

I hope, therefore, as we have once agreed upon language that was conceded to be expressive of our sentiment upon this question that we shall agree to it again and incorporate it in this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senate will recollect probably that when the former bill was under consideration there was considerable discussion as to the meaning and effect of this proviso. Some members of the committee from which the bill came, the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River of the Senate, announced immediately after the bill was reported, by offering an amendment qualifying this proviso, their doubt as to whether the proviso did not absolutely prohibit the building of levees even for the purpose of improving navigation and deepening the channel of the river. Finally it was agreed that the bill might pass, and it did pass unanimously, with a declaration on my part and on the part of some others still entertaining the doubt as to whether the restriction in the bill did not amount to a prohibition that would affect the improvement of the navigation and the deepening of the channel of the Mississippi River. We agreed that it might pass and go to the House and there depend upon the consideration of the Mississippi River Improvement Committee, that was known to be committed against any such proviso, because they had reported a bill already precisely like the Senate bill, except that it contained no proviso in regard to this matter. So much for that. There was no unanimity; there was no declaration of unanimity; but the bill went to the House under those circumstances.

When the Senate bill reached the House it went upon the Speaker's table, where it remained; but the Committee on Commerce of the House took the question up, sent for the members of the commission, and took the advice of the commission. Certainly it is not desirable to tie the hands of the commission. When they passed upon the question as to whether the proviso did not absolutely restrict them so as to defeat the very object of the appropriation and leave them without any discretion to close the gaps caused by recent crevasses and by old crevasses, and thus retard and prevent the very object of the appropriation, namely, the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, the House committee declared, I believe with unanimity, that the effect in their judgment of the proviso adopted by the Senate was to so restrict them.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Was any such conversation as that reported? I have seen the printed conference between the members of the commission and the committee of the House, and I do not think the printed conference contains any discussion on the subject the Senator mentions.

Mr. KELLOGG. There was some diversity of opinion in the Committee on Commerce in the House (I may say that, I suppose, with propriety) when this matter was under consideration there. I suppose it is a fact that will not be disputed; it is evidenced by the bill before us; but finally after considering the matter carefully, and hearing the opinions of the commission, they settled down upon the proviso contained in the bill before us.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to repeat that the entire examination of the members of the commission before the House committee has been printed, as I understand. I have a copy of it, and certainly it does not appear that the opinion of the commission was asked as to the effect of the proviso.

Mr. KELLOGG. They were certainly consulted, I may say, as I was assured by a member of the Committee on Commerce of the House. I think it safe to say that when they had the Senate proviso and the whole question before them and consulted the commissioners, they finally determined, after mature consideration, and agreed, I believe, with unanimity upon the proviso as it appears in the bill. I speak of the Committee on Commerce of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator again whether he has any information which he can bring to the Senate that any member of that commission expressed an opinion that the amendment now proposed, which was the proviso in the original Senate bill, interfered in any way with the proper action of that commission?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say that I have been assured by members of the Committee on Commerce of the House and by others that the members of the commission expressed themselves as satisfied with this proviso, and believed that it would not interfere with them, and preferred the proviso which has come to us from the House to that adopted by the Senate. The House Committee on Commerce adopted it for that reason and sent it over here. It went to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and we adopted the House proviso, and reported it to the Senate, and now it is proposed by the Senator from Maine to adopt an entirely different provision, which in and of itself it is believed restrains (because there is no saving clause) and restricts and handicaps the commission, and is calculated, to say the least, to retard their work.

Mr. FRYE. My amendment is intended to restrain and restrict them beyond any question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Even if the closing of the gaps aids in the improvement of the Mississippi River and is in the interest of commerce and navigation.

Mr. FRYE. I do not say that.

Mr. KELLOGG. I say it. If that is not so, then what is the objection to retaining the provision as it came from the House, which prohibits the building of levees unless in the judgment of the Mississippi River commission it be in the interest of navigation and the deepening of the channel of the river, but for no other purpose, not for the purpose of redeeming the overflowed lands? The proviso gives the commission authority to build levees when it is necessary for the purpose of carrying out the objects for which the commission was created, namely, to deepen the channel of the river and improve the navigation thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 32.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I think there is a substantial difference between the House proviso and the proviso moved by the Senator from Maine, and I find it in the phraseology of the twelve hundred and thirty-eighth and twelve hundred and thirty-ninth lines. The commission is authorized to repair and build levees "if in their judgment it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce of the river." If the word were "navigation" alone, I think it would be very difficult to point out any substantial distinction between the effect of the two provisos, but it is very easy to see that the commission may be of opinion that the diking out the waters of the river Mississippi from the land occupied by a city or village on its bank increases very much the safety of the commerce of the river. It is not "navigation" alone, but "commerce."

Seeing that substantial distinction, which I think ought not to be recognized and ought not to be made in the language of the bill without seeing it, (such an important matter ought not to go into a bill blindly or by indirection,) I prefer the language of the bill as it came from the House to the language of the amendment of the Senator from Maine, because I am in favor of expending money from the national Treasury for the protection of villages or cities or large tracts of country on the banks of the Mississippi River from the overflow of the waters of that stream.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire in justice to myself, in reference to the vote that I shall give here, to state that the committee were not unanimous upon this question. The amendment now offered by the Senator from Maine was a pending amendment before the Committee on Commerce proposed to this bill. The committee upon the adoption of that amendment differed, and as this question involves a matter of principle I must retain in the Senate the position I held in the committee, that there is a material difference between the text of the bill and the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine. As I felt compelled in committee to vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Maine, I must do so here.

The language of the bill is "that the commission is authorized to repair and build levees if in their judgment it should be done as a part of their plan to afford ease and safety to the navigation and commerce." The only necessity there is that they should deem it in their judgment proper as a part of their plan to afford ease to the navigation that these levees be built.

Mr. HOAR. To the navigation and commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. That strengthens the objection, of course.

Mr. FRYE. The word "ease" must cover every landing up the river, and all that.

Mr. McMILLAN. The amendment of the Senator from Maine makes it necessary as a part of the improvement of the navigation that a levee be built before the commission can be authorized to exercise their judgment in favor of it. I think the distinction is very broad and plain, and in view of the principle involved in it the amendment of the Senator from Maine should be adopted as the expression of the same view in a separate bill passed by the Senate. I differed with the committee with regret, but feel compelled to take the same position here, and I make these remarks by way of explanation.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I desire to say also that in my judgment the House proviso here is different from the Senate provision, and any one who will notice the desire there is to keep even so much permission to build levees to prevent overflows can see at once that there is incorporated or intended to be incorporated in this bill some kind of a crevasse through which this appropriation may go to prevent injury from the overflow of the river to the surrounding lands and to reclaim them.

Sir, I have felt, and I feel now, that if there has been any question whatever in the House or in the Senate that these appropriations were to be solely for the improvement of the channel of that river to the exclusion of all improvements to reclaim land, this bill never would have been here with this feature in it, and no bill could have passed the Senate or passed the House for that purpose. I am as much in favor as any one can be, and have proved myself for thirteen years in the House and Senate, of granting large appropriations for all the improvements necessary for the navigation of that great highway of our country, the Mississippi River. I have voted for them at all times and under all circumstances when confined to that legitimate and proper object, and am ready to so vote again and again, as long as I may have an opportunity to do it in this Chamber. But, sir, it is not in good faith to those who have thus stood as firmly and as strongly as they were able to in favor of large appropriations for this improvement, to seek by little tricks to extend the appropriation to objects which were not contemplated and which were positively refused to be incorporated in any of the bills for this purpose heretofore.

Do gentlemen say that these two provisions are just alike? They have said so. Both the Senators from Louisiana tell us there is no substantial difference. If there is no substantial difference, why do they urge the House provision? Why do they come with a proposition which seems to be different, which seems to look to the reclamation of overflowed lands, which seems to look to the prevention of injuries from overflow which the Senate and the House both have rejected time and time over in the past? Why do they insist on this clause unless it is to give greater latitude in that direction? In these appropriation bills and in what requires my vote for or against them, I want the proposition to be so clear and distinct that I and all other Senators and the country can understand what we are voting for. I believe the people of the United States have expressed, wherever they have expressed an opinion at all, a strong desire to give large, generous, munificent appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River. This desire is not confined to the valley of the Mississippi. The whole of this country has expressed it, all the East has requested it, all the West has requested it. We come to meet that question in a liberal and generous and manly way and spirit. Why will the friends of this measure, why will those more directly interested in it, compel us to go further, to go beyond what the sentiment of our people requires in this respect; for I say without any fear of contradiction that if it were understood by the people of the United States outside of the valley of the Mississippi that this was the beginning of a scheme to reclaim private lands for private purposes, to enhance the value of those lands, to make them free from overflow by means of appropriations from the General Government, such a bill as this could not pass in the House or in the Senate.

We all profess to mean the same thing; we profess to mean that this appropriation shall be expended on the Father of Waters to deepen its channel of navigation and commerce, and not to improve the property of A, B, or C, situated within a mile or within one hundred miles of that river. No man dare openly advocate the appropriation of money from the Treasury to improve private property by reclaiming it; no man dare stand up as the advocate of that measure in this Senate; but in a roundabout way, by permissive legislation, by uncertain legislation, it is proposed here to instruct a commission, which we have created, that they may, in some manner, justify themselves in doing that which the Legislature of the country has endeavored to prevent them from doing at all.

I say, Mr. President, in my judgment it would be the most unfortunate thing in the future for the improvement of the Mississippi River itself and for future appropriations that may be asked, if this provision in this bill should lead to the expenditure of money for the purpose of reclaiming lands or for preventing injury to them by overflow, except as that may come and must come incidentally.

Why, sir, the whole theory of the Mississippi River commission is, and the whole theory of the engineers is, that by narrowing and confining the water by some means, levees or otherwise, within its proper channel, it will deepen its channel, the level of its surface will sink with the improvement, and there will be no need, or comparatively little need of levees at all. If that theory is incorrect, then we are groping in the dark; if that theory is incorrect, this commission is misleading us; if that theory is correct, then we do not need any such clause as this or anything that shall give a possible chance to misappropriate the money we give to the improvement of the channel of the Mississippi by building levees and dikes to prevent overflows or to reclaim lands.

It is more than a mere passing sentiment about this; it is vital to the question. If the plan of the Mississippi River commission is right, and the reports of the engineers adopted by the two Houses are right, the object is so to confine the channel of the river and narrow it in the proper places, by whatever embankments or levees are necessary, as to compel it to scour out its channel and deepen it, deepen it down many feet below its present surface, so that in a deeper channel, not a wider one, the vast waters of the Mississippi may work their way to the Gulf, and keep forever a deep, permanent, suitable channel for the navigation of that great inland empire, the valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have but a word to say about this amendment. This year will be a marked one in the way of appropriations for the development of the navigation of the Mississippi. In the history of this country no such appropriation has ever been proposed or successfully passed as is the present one. It has passed the Senate already in the shape of a separate bill. It is a recognition of what I have called before in the Senate the improvement of the great interior water-front of the country, just as much so as is the oceanic water-front. So you find the group of States which bind this great river and its tributaries form as important a nucleus and bulk of commercial interest as any other, and they are entitled to equal consideration.

After all, this great appropriation of $5,000,000 is experimental. It is to test a great engineering problem. For its success it will depend upon the skill of those to whom it is committed. The clause reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce seems to me rather more elastic than that proposed by the Senator from Maine as an amendment, and I submit to the good sense of the Senate whether it will not be a false economy to restrict these engineers from an expenditure of this money in the way of stopping a crevasse or mending a levee, provided they find that that is conducive to the great object of securing proper navigation.

The whole matter is experimental. The money that you spend, and five times the money, may prove to be unwisely spent, and it may be that some other theory of engineering as connected with the hydraulics of that river may be found necessary; but you are doing the best you can by choosing an able body of specialists to conduct and control the expenditure of the money; and I say that it is unwise to restrict their practical execution of this order, and it is much wiser to give them a better opportunity to complete what I may call the incidentals, when you already have provided their power to execute the principal object. Therefore, for the purpose of facilitating the great object for which this large sum of money is to be appropriated, I shall vote in favor of a more liberal scale of power and discretion to the engineers in charge than is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Maine, although I should consider that that was sufficient. But I am told that upon consultation with these engineers themselves, they declare that they might be embarrassed in respect of incidental repairs on the banks of this river, which may be necessary to promote the navigation of the river. Therefore, I submit, it is not worth while for us in any way to jeopard the principal for the sake of saving some inferior and non-essential incident.

I think, therefore, that the clause more fully considered of the Senate committee should receive the approval of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all votes upon this bill with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I have no idea how he would vote on this amendment; but I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Aldrich,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Lapham,	Morrill,	Sherman,
Frye,	McMillan,	Platt,	Windom.

NAYS—39.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Beck,	Farley,	Jonas,	Saunders,
Blair,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Brown,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Vance,
Butler,	Gorman,	Kellogg,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Grover,	Lamar,	Vest,
Camden,	Hampton,	Mahone,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	Maxey,	Walker,
Chilcott,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Williams.
Coke,	Ingalls,	Pugh,

ABSENT—21.

Allison,	Fair,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Garland,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Groome,	McDill,	Sewell.
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	McPherson,
Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller of Cal.,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANSOM. I am instructed by the special committee on the potomac flats to offer this amendment to the bill, to be inserted on page 20, after line 457:

Improving the Potomac River in the vicinity of Washington with reference to the improvement of the navigation, the establishment of harbor lines, and the raising of the flats, under the direction of the Secretary of War and in accordance with the plan and report made in compliance with the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1881, and the reports of the board of engineers made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of December 13, 1881, $500,000.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to interpose the objection to that amendment that it is not in order. There is no estimate; it is not moved in accordance with any estimate which has been made to Congress. There has been no report made by the committee to which that subject was referred; the matter is not before Congress. And I make all the other objections under the rules, whatever they are; I cannot specify them all now.

Mr. RANSOM. This amendment comes from the special committee on this subject, which is the very point covered by the rule now before the Chair. If there should be any doubt on that question, I hope it will be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask my friend from North Carolina if it was not before the Committee on Commerce also?

Mr. RANSOM. Oh, yes, sir. It is reported here to-day by order of a special committee appointed on this subject, and it was before the Committee on Commerce also.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator from North Carolina must be mistaken in regard to this matter having been before the Committee on Commerce. It was originally referred to the Committee on Commerce, but a special committee was raised by the Senate to take jurisdiction of this matter exclusively. That committee has the matter under consideration; it has been considering it, and has never made a report yet. The Committee on Commerce have nothing to do with it, have not considered it, and certainly it is not a matter embraced within this bill. It is not a harbor or a river improvement. It does not refer to the improvement of navigation. It is a sanitary measure, avowedly so, and there is no incident here which characterizes it as an improvement of the Potomac.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment of Mr. RANSOM.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is not in order and is not germane, then there is not a single proposition contained in this bill that is in order and is germane. It is to improve the harbor at Washington, on the Potomac River, a navigable stream; and, strange to say, within this bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors, in which almost every creek or canal in the United States of America is named, there is no mention of the words "improvement of the Potomac at Washington," the capital of the country; and yet to my certain knowledge the very way to the navy-yard in this city is so blockaded by increasing swamps that every day almost vessels are grounded. Only a few days ago the President of the United States, on a Government vessel, was grounded on the way from the navy-yard out into the port. I myself the other day, going on a boat along this river, right in front of the city, was, as I supposed for a moment, grounded, but finally the vessel was able to get off. The fact that there is no appropriation in this bill for the improvement of the Potomac River at Washington is one of the remarkable features of this most remarkable bill.

The amendment is plainly in order; not only that, it is in order in an unlimited sense. The Committee on Commerce has no priority alone to report amendments to this bill. Any committee of this body has a right to report an amendment, and here is a committee selected from this body for the purpose of taking charge of this very thing; that is, it was given precedence, and this select committee was chosen from out of the Committee on Commerce to consider it. Five members, I am told, of the select committee are members of the Committee on Commerce, and they were appointed to examine into this very matter.

Mr. McMILLAN. There was no person appointed because he was a member of the Committee on Commerce, but because he was a member of the Senate; and there are members on that special committee who have no connection with the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true; but a majority of that committee as I am told are members of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to correct the Senator from Ohio. Originally the Committee on Commerce were authorized to appoint a subcommittee to investigate this matter. That was the initial step, and after that a select committee was appointed.

Mr. RANSOM. May I inform the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Louisiana how the matter stands? This whole question was originally referred on the 9th of May, 1881, to the Committee on Commerce, and that committee first appointed a sub-committee of five members to attend to it. Afterward, on the 13th of December, 1881, that sub-committee was changed to a select committee of the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. For the purpose of letting it have a stenographer and giving it more dignity.

Mr. RANSOM. On the day before, and on the day on which this bill was reported to the Senate, the matter was considered by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from North Carolina will bear me out that the Committee on Commerce authorized him to offer the resolution for the appointment of this very select committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me read the rule, and see whether this is not in order. Rule 27 says:

All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill * * * unless—

Here is the exception—

Unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate.

Here is a select committee of the Senate——

Mr. GARLAND. Will the Senator read the first portion of Rule 28 in connection with that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me take my own way in presenting the case. Here is the very case presented; but it is said it is not upon an estimate of engineers. Why, sir, I have here the report of the engineers myself, transmitted by the Secretary of War, containing a detailed estimate down to the last cent for this improvement. So it comes within every qualification that is required. The rule provides that any committee of this body, any select committee of this body can, without an estimate, submit an amendment of this kind. It is only that a private Senator cannot introduce an amendment here without an estimate; but a committee can report an amendment without an estimate, because the rule so reads. If either a committee of this body reports an item, or if it is estimated for by any Department of the Government, it is in order, and this is both. It is reported here by the committee having charge of the subject; it relates to the very subject-matter of this bill; and here are estimates in the most ample detail in regard to this very appropriation. The point of order cannot be sustained, certainly.

Mr. President, there is not a single item contained in this bill of sixty-six pages that has been so thoroughly examined in all its parts and bearings as this particular proposition. It seems to me that for us to vote $20,000,000 of Government money to improve rivers and harbors, and make no appropriation for that which is within our sight, within our smell, I may say, all around us, a harbor on which we have built a navy-yard which is blockaded by growing swamps caused by ourselves, by the drainage of the city, in which our vessels daily ground in our presence, would be a most remarkable proceeding. Why, sir, it would be a scandal and a shame, it seems to me, under the circumstances, not to make some suitable provision for the improvement of this harbor; and if in the course of that improvement as proposed by the engineers we may also relieve the people of this city from a growing danger that threatens them that certainly ought to be no objection to it. It is the improvement of the harbor that is proposed; and if by improving this harbor we do a great good to the people of this city we certainly ought to do it. For four summers have I been here within sight and smell of this harbor of Washington, and I do not want the people of this city to endure it longer if Congress can by any wise provision relieve them.

Mr. GARLAND. I am very much in favor of this proposition introduced by the Senator from North Carolina, and I think that the Potomac flats, as they are termed ordinarily, ought to be attended to, and I would go any length to do that. If the special committee had reported a bill for that purpose I would have gone with them hand and heart. But under the twenty-eighth rule of this body I am constrained to believe that the amendment offered by the select committee is not in order. Rule 27 first makes the appropriation bill for rivers and harbors a general appropriation bill. Then Rule 28 says:

All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Appropriations in that rule of course means any committee that has charge of a general appropriation bill. The trouble in this case is that the special committee should have moved this and had it referred to the committee having charge of this bill one day before it is offered in the Senate. That is the rule; and much as I regret the application of the rule to the measure proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, of which I approve as a separate measure, I am still constrained to interpose the point.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Before this question of improvement is gone into, would it not be as well to ascertain where the title to this property resides that we propose to improve?

Mr. RANSOM. That question is not pertinent at this time, because the merits of the proposition cannot be discussed on the question of admitting the amendment under the rule.

Let me say a word to my friend from Arkansas. He will remember in the first place that this amendment is moved by a committee of the body; and the rule to which he refers does not apply to an amendment moved by a committee. It applies to an amendment moved by a member of the body. This proposition was originally before the Committee on Commerce of this body, and by an order of the committee I was instructed to move that it be referred to that committee. It was so referred to that committee and staid before it six or seven months, and only during the present session in that committee upon this identical bill was this amendment discussed.

The whole purpose of the rule is to prevent surprise upon the Senate. Here is a subject which has been before the Committee on Commerce not only a day but seven months. And if gentlemen are technical, what does the rule amount to? I could now, if I thought proper, at fifteen minutes after five o'clock, give notice of the amendment, and then on Monday it would be properly cognizable by the Senate. But is not the Senate as well aware of it this evening as it would be on Monday? Is anybody taken by surprise? Has not the question of the Potomac flats been before the Senate for over twelve months? Has it not been before the country for years?

If there is any question about it, I ask that it be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. The amendment upon its face professes to be for the improvement of the harbor of the city of Washington, and that, I suppose, governs the question of order. The city of Washington is perhaps the only port over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction. It is the port where we can register all vessels engaged in the commerce of the United States, and the only place where we can register them so as to exempt any vessel registered from the burdens of local taxation by States that may see fit to impose burdens on them. It is a place where we certainly ought to take care to have such a port as will be fit to have our vessels registered.

That is what the amendment professes on its face; and when you come to the question of precedent, it is not yet a week since the Senate by an overwhelming vote declared that upon a deficiency bill an amendment to pay the physicians and others who waited upon President Garfield during his illness was in order. That was declared to be in order, although there was no law for it, and the subject had been referred to another committee in the House. It was only yesterday that the Senate, by an overwhelming majority again, declared that the Hennepin Canal project was in order as an amendment to a river and harbor bill, although it was to be dug through a country where there was neither river nor harbor nor jurisdiction in the United States. Now, to say that a proposition that proposes to improve the harbor of the city of Washington is not in order seems to me, in view of these precedents, to be a remarkable objection.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator believe those rulings were correct?

Mr. BECK. I do not believe any of them was correct. I have never known a ruling of the Senate that was not to do just whatever a majority of the Senate wanted done, and as I think the harbor of Washington ought to be improved and it can be done on this bill and I am in favor of this measure, I do not propose to go back on the capital of the country.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Kentucky is partly right and partly wrong in saying that this amendment upon its face purports to make an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Washington.

Mr. RANSOM. I beg to say one word to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. McMILLAN. I prefer to make this point, if the Senator will excuse me a moment. It does in its language embrace the purpose of improving the harbor at Washington, but it further expressly declares that it is an appropriation for the reclamation of the flats. That being one of the distinct purposes of this appropriation, that is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce. The reclamation of the flats is not an improvement of navigation, and that being one of the purposes embraced in this proposed amendment, it must affect the entire amendment. You cannot attach something that is relevant to something that is irrelevant, and say that the amendment is in order. Therefore the amendment is irrelevant, and upon that ground the point of order must be sustained.

But, Mr. President, whatever may be the language of this appropriation, it is very clear that the Senate did not consider it as a matter pertaining to the improvement of the harbor here; that it is a mere sanitary measure, that that is the feature of the improvement, and if any improvement of navigation is incident to that it is merely an incident; the main feature is the reclamation of the flats.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to know whether there has been any complaint on the part of the commercial community with respect to the inadequacy of the existing facilities for the commerce here?

Mr. McMILLAN. None has come to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Minnesota has forgotten, if he will pardon me for saying so, that for years committees of the citizens of the District have waited upon the Committee on Commerce and begged them for harbor improvements. I do not know that the engineer of the United States came before the committee, but I know he came before me when this bill was reported from the House and stated that no appropriation had been put in it for the improvement of the harbor of Washington and Georgetown, and I told him it would go in; I had no doubt it would go in. As the Senator from Kentucky says, I could not dream that in the year 1882 the Congress of the country would neglect to vote the necessary appropriations for the improvement of the harbor of the capital of the country.

Mr. McMILLAN. Nevertheless it is my duty and my privilege to insist that any amendment to this river and harbor bill shall be in order, and this one, for the reason I have stated, I do not believe is in order.

In addition to the grounds stated by the Senator from Arkansas it is a mere question of sanitary regulations of this city, and a special committee has been raised for the purpose of examining that question and reporting upon it to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I wish to call his attention to the fact that at the last session of Congress, by the act of March 3, 1881, a survey was directed to be made in the river and harbor bill, as follows:

> Potomac and Anacostia Rivers, in the vicinity of Washington, District of Columbia, with reference to the improvement of navigation, the establishment of the harbor-line, and the raising of the flats, so far as their improvement may be necessary to the improvement of navigation and the establishment of the harbor-line.

The very language used in this amendment has already been reported by the Committee on Commerce in a bill that became a law and passed at the last session. The act of appropriation for rivers and harbors, approved March 3, 1881, contained this provision.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is not the present Congress, and it has not been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and is not embraced in this bill as an improvement of the harbor of Washington, and has been taken up, as I regard it, as a distinct matter altogether from the improvement of the river or the harbor at Washington.

Now, Mr. President, I know that there is a great effort to have these Potomac flats improved. I know that an appropriation is asked for that object, and that it is merely for sanitary purposes. The whole examination has gone upon that ground. As the bill is pending, I want the bill disposed of, and let this measure come up, as it should, upon its own merits in a separate bill, and then we can fully and fairly consider it, and not increase the river and harbor bill by an appropriation for an improvement of this kind.

Mr. VOORHEES. I concur fully with every word so well uttered by the Senator from Ohio on this subject. I believe that great and necessary improvements ought to be made to the harbor for the purpose of navigation in and about this city. Here is a river a mile wide, and a branch of it lying to the east of us, in which by proper improvements the largest ships in the world may find sufficient water, whereas now yachts and small vessels go aground on various occasions.

The time will come when the railroads will be required to build a proper bridge in place of the Long Bridge, so as no longer to obstruct navigation.

I have had some trouble in my mind in regard to the support of this tremendous river and harbor bill. I expect, however, to give it my support. It has in it $6,000,000 for the Mississippi River. In my mind the only way for a proper rivalry to be built up in this country to the great trunk lines of railroad is by deepening and improving water lines of transportation. I speak thus in relation to the general features of the bill; but it strikes me as it does the Senator from Ohio strangely that this great river, almost an estuary up to this city, should have no mention in this the largest river and harbor bill ever considered in the American Congress.

So much, Mr. President, in regard to those features that make this amendment in my judgment in order. I am not now speaking about the technical rules. They are understood by my learned friend from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] better than by me; but I am speaking of those great principles that make such an amendment as this in order to such a bill as we have before us. A word further. When we are improving this harbor for navigable purposes, if we improve it likewise for the health of this great capital, certainly that will not weaken its claims upon me. During all last summer, during those painful days of distress and suffering, when the distinguished sufferer lay in the White House, there was one subject on which the medical bulletins were never wrong. They may have erred in other particulars; but when day after day it was set forth that the Potomac flats were poisoning the air that he and everybody else here had to breathe there was a general concurrence in the fidelity of those bulletins, and in that way we were scandalized before the nations of the world; we were advertised as a people with a capital with such a river front as to render it unwholesome to live in, and it brought the blush of shame and humiliation to my face, whatever it did to others. It was a scandal upon this country, and there is no measure within the reach of constitutional power that I am not ready to embrace to relieve the capital of this country from this stain and this imputation.

I shall vote, Mr. President, if the question is submitted to the Senate, that the amendment is in order, to improve this river, for the reasons I have named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. While the Chair would experience not the slighest difficulty in deciding the question of order, inasmuch as the Senator from North Carolina has twice requested that it be submitted to the Senate, the Chair submits to the Senate the question, Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina in order? and the Senate will decide the question of order for itself.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, there have been some comments made on the fact that the Committee on Commerce did not put in this bill the usual appropriation for the improvement of the Georgetown and Washington channels in the Potomac River. It is proper to say that a majority of the Committee on Commerce were members of the select committee appointed to consider a plan for the improvement of the Georgetown and Washington channels for the purposes of nagivation, and to recommend if they chose that plan which would be a necessary part of the work hereafter of reclaiming for sanitary purposes the noxious flats in front of the city. For that reason neither in the House nor in the Senate was any appropriation recommended by the Secretary of War for these improvements to be put in the river and harbor bill. It was because the other plan in its basis and in the mode of its operations required the construction of a sea-wall from Easby's Point, near Georgetown, along the outer border of the flats and down beyond the Long Bridge to the deeper waters of the Washington channel, and a return wall up to the bridge for the Washington channel, that we did not make the usual appropriation in the river and harbor bill which has been made for some years past for improving the Potomac River and the harbors of Georgetown and Washington.

Whether there was any distinct understanding in regard to this or not, that matter was talked of. I, as a member of the select committee, was prepared to report directly a plan for the whole general work, or I was prepared when the proper time came for an amendment in the Senate to favor a report for that part of the appropriation which referred more directly to the navigation and channels of the river. That latter course was selected. The improvement of the river channel must be made before the other work can be done—before the reclamation of the flats, before filling in these miasmatic valleys. If this be provided for, Congress will decide what shall be done and to what extent the remainder of the report in regard to the sanitary part of this work shall be carried on; but the very report itself contemplates making this channel secure by revetment, by walls—by building, as it were, dikes or jetties to confine the channel of the Potomac between the Virginia side and the outer extremity of these noxious flats, passing down that way and returning up to the Long Bridge.

Whatever may be done, that has to be done first. That belongs to the navigation of the channel. We have been expending thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars upon the same work; and we should have put in one, two, or three hundred thousand dollars for continuing the improvement this year, and this would probably complete to a great extent the improvements of these channels, and they are necessary to be done before the other plan reported by the board of engineers can even be commenced. It seems to me if that statement is true, this amendment is perfectly in order, it is perfectly germane to the bill. It has the recommendation and is in conformity with the estimates of the Department, it has the recommendation of a select committee, and was reported by that committee to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from North Carolina who offered this amendment, inasmuch as four different methods have been suggested for the improvement of the channel and the reclamation of the flats, varying in their estimates of the final cost from two to four million dollars, which one is contemplated in the amendment that he submits to be acted upon by the Senate?

Mr. RANSOM. I should take the greatest pleasure in the world in answering my friend from Kansas if I had the unanimous consent of the Senate to do so; but I understand that on points of order we cannot discuss the merits of a proposition.

Mr. BECK. The question is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire the point of order to be settled, and then if the Senate will give me time I will try to satisfy the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BECK. I understand that the point of order is submitted to the Senate, and, in order that the Senate may intelligently vote upon that point, they want to know the answer precisely to the question put by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. RANSOM. I am ready to make the answer.

Mr. INGALLS. I was somewhat surprised when this matter was first considered by the Senate that it was not referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which I thought had jurisdiction, and which had given the subject a great deal of very careful scrutiny and attention. I did not, however, at the time complain because the matter was taken away from that committee and referred to a select committee composed of members of the Committee on Commerce. I have very clear and definite ideas in my mind as to what course ought to be taken in regard to this confessedly very important subject.

There is very little doubt in my mind that technically this amendment is amenable to the point of order. The rule declares that—

> In like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being offered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

It does not get behind this provision of the rule to say that the subject had been referred by the Senate to the Committee on Commerce. The question is, whether the amendment that is now offered for the consideration of the Senate had before being offered been referred to the Committee on Commerce. I am aware that the rules of the Senate are very elastic, and I may add that the conscience of the Senate in their interpretation has always been very elastic. They have been construed for the purpose of carrying out the intentions and will of the majority. They are made chiefly to be violated, and there is no question that has ever been submitted upon which decisions cannot be found on both sides.

Therefore, I say, Mr. President, it is important to me in passing upon the point of order to ascertain, in view of the action that has heretofore been taken by the Committee on the District of Columbia, what method of expenditure is contemplated in connection with the $500,000 that are appropriated in this amendment? I have no doubt that the subject is one of very great importance. I shall be very glad, if it appears that this money is to be expended in accordance with what I believe to be the proper method of channel-improvement and flat-reclamation, to vote for it; but I shall not, if it is understood that this is to be left open to the consideration of the engineers hereafter to adopt plans that in my judgment will be ineffectual and that will be expensive beyond precedent, permit this to be acted on under the point of order if my objection can prevent it.

I therefore think that to enable the Senate to act understandingly, to know whether this money is to be expended as the Senate would have it expended, inasmuch as this question has been one that has been considered by boards of engineers repeatedly who differed in their methods and plans, it is essential that we should know what method of expenditure is to be adopted in case this amendment is agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] in order?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is declared to be in order.

Mr. BUTLER. We evidently cannot get through the bill to-night. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. RANSOM. If it is possible, I would like very much to get through with this amendment this evening.

Mr. VOORHEES. It seems to me we had better vote on this amendment and then adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina withdraw his motion?

Mr. BUTLER. I will withdraw the motion if we can get a vote on this amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I shall ask the Senate to go on with the consideration of the bill and dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

Mr. INGALLS. It will be impossible, Mr. President, to vote upon this amendment without having action by the Senate upon the questions that have been submitted by the engineers. I propose to ask the opinion of the Senate as to the plan that shall be adopted in the expenditure of this money.

Mr. RANSOM. One word. I certainly agree now with what the Senator from Kansas has said, and have no idea of pressing this matter on an unwilling Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

NEWBURGH CENTENNIAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to make an announcement. Under the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to erect at Washington's headquarters in the city of Newburgh, New York, a memorial column, and to aid in defraying the expenses of the centennial celebration to be held at that city in the year 1883, the President of the Senate was authorized to appoint five Senators, and he appoints Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. MILLER of New York, Mr. HILL of Colorado, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. HAMPTON the committee on the part of the Senate to attend the celebration.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 2114) establishing the Territory of Pembina and providing a temporary government therefor.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 8, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I ask that that portion of the Journal relating to the introduction and passage of pension bills be not read.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my objection, as we cannot hear it at any rate.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be approved as read.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CRAPO. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of submitting a privileged report. I send up to the Clerk's desk a conference report for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10, 15, 16, 17, 18, 22, and 23, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: Page 5, strike out all after "provided," in line 20, down to and including "by," in line 21, and insert after "provided," in line 20, "herein," and insert after "notes," in line 21, "shall be issued as provided by this act."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 6, strike out section 8, and insert:

"SEC. 8. That national banks now organized, or hereafter organized, having a capital of $150,000 or less, shall not be required to keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States United States bonds in excess of one-quarter of their capital stock as security for their circulating notes; but such banks shall keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States the amount of bonds as herein required. And such of those banks having on deposit bonds in excess of that amount are authorized to reduce their circulation by the deposit of lawful money as provided by law; provided that the amount of such circulating notes shall not in any case exceed 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited as herein provided; provided further that the national banks which shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the retirement in full of their circulation shall at the time of their deposit be assessed for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes then outstanding, a sum equal to the average cost of the redemption of national-bank notes during the preceding year, and shall thereupon pay such assessment. And all national banks which have heretofore made or shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the reduction of their circulation shall be assessed and shall pay an assessment in the manner specified in section 3 of the act approved June 20, 1874, for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes redeemed from such deposits subsequent to June 30, 1881."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: Page 7, strike out all after "purpose," in line 13, down to and including line 19, and insert: "And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to bonds called for redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to the withdrawal of circulating notes in consequence thereof;" and the Senate agree to the same.

WM. W. CRAPO,
NELSON DINGLEY, JR.,
A. H. BUCKNER,
Managers on the part of the House.
WM. B. ALLISON,
JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, these amendments are very important, and I ask whether it would not be better to let this conference report be printed in the RECORD and go over so that we may have an opportunity of seeing exactly what has been done.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that there is no statement accompanying this conference report as provided by the rules of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that it be printed and go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the rules require a statement to accompany all conference reports.

Mr. CRAPO. After the most careful consideration, Mr. Speaker, the conferees have agreed unanimously to this report. There is no disagreement whatever on the subject.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the conference report has left the gold certificates at $20 or reduced them to $10.

Mr. CRAPO. That remains as it did in the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. I am sorry for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. How about section 12?

Mr. CRAPO. It was adopted precisely as it passed in the Senate. Silver certificates, silver reserves in banks, all those matters remain as before.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has there been any discrimination made by the committee of conference?

Mr. CRAPO. None whatever. Silver certificates stand precisely the same as gold certificates. They enter into the settlement of the clearing-house. The section is not entirely satisfactory, but upon careful deliberation the House conferees have yielded to the Senate and that section remains.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have had no opportunity to examine these recommendations of the committee of conference, and I suggest that the report be printed and that members may have an opportunity of seeing it before they are called upon to vote.

Mr. CRAPO. These amendments have been printed since the 23d day of June.

Mr. HOLMAN. But attention has not been called to them as attention is now called to them in this report of the committee of conference. With a view therefore of affording opportunity to members to examine what has been done by the committee of conference I ask that this report be allowed to go over and be printed in the RECORD.

I trust in all fairness we shall be permitted to have until to-morrow morning to look into the matter.

Mr. CRAPO. I see no reason for delay.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the matter is to go over until Monday next I do not insist on my point of order. Let the report be printed in the RECORD so we may see all the changes. It is a privileged matter and will come up at any time.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to say that the changes which are made in this bill can be explained in a very short time; and with the consent of the committee I will make a brief statement, so that there will be no necessity for its going over. It had better be acted upon now.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a statement accompanying this?

Mr. SPRINGER. No.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do the House conferees yield to the Senate in the matter of the expense attending the change of this circulation?

Mr. BUCKNER. The House conferees yielded in that respect, and I can explain the reason for that in a few moments, and I think satisfactorily. There were a few matters of disagreement of serious importance between the conferees, and the one to which my friend calls attention, I agree with him, is a matter of considerable moment, but a few words of explanation will, I think, satisfy the House——

Mr. RANDALL. I make the inquiry whether there is a statement accompanying this report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is not.

Mr. RANDALL. There should be one as required by the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the demand.

Mr. CRAPO. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist upon the objection?

Mr. RANDALL. I do insist upon it at this time.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires such a statement to be submitted with the report, and if objection is made the report cannot be received at this time.

Mr. CRAPO. I will withdraw the report for the present, and submit it hereafter with the necessary statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill and amendments as agreed to by the conference committee be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

An act (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any national banking association organized under the acts of February 25, 1863, June 3, 1864, and February 14, 1880, or under sections 5133, 5134, 5135, 5136, and 5154 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may, at any time within the two years next previous to the date of the expiration of its corporate existence under present law, and with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, to be granted as hereinafter provided, extend its period of succession by amending its articles of association for a term of not more than twenty years from the expiration of the period of succession named in said articles of association, and shall have succession for such extended period, unless sooner dissolved by the act of shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law, or unless hereafter modified or repealed.

SEC. 2. That such amendment of said articles of association shall be authorized by the consent in writing of shareholders owning not less than two-thirds of the capital stock of the association; and the board of directors shall cause such consent to be certified under the seal of the association, by its president or cashier, to the Comptroller of the Currency, accompanied by an application made by the president or cashier for the approval of the amended articles of association by the Comptroller; and such amended articles of association shall not be valid until the Comptroller shall give to such association a certificate under his hand and seal that the association has complied with all the provisions required to be complied with, and is authorized to have succession for the extended period named in the amended articles of association.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of the application and certificate of the association provided for in the preceding section, the Comptroller of the Currency shall cause a special examination to be made, at the expense of the association, to determine its condition; and if after such examination or otherwise it appears to him that said association is in a satisfactory condition, he shall grant his certificate of approval provided for in the preceding section, or if it appears that the condition of said association is not satisfactory he shall withhold such certificate of approval.

SEC. 4. That any association so extending the period of its succession shall continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges and immunities granted and shall continue to be subject to all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions imposed by the Revised Statutes of the United States and other acts having reference to national banking associations, and it shall continue to be in all respects the identical association it was before the extension of its period of succession: Provided, however, That the jurisdiction for suits hereafter brought by or against any association established under any law providing for national banking associations, except suits between them and the United States, or its officers and agents, shall be the same as, and not other than, the jurisdiction for suits by or against banks not organized under any law of the United States which do or might do banking business where such national banking associations may be doing business when such suits may be begun. And all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with this proviso be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

SEC. 5. That when any national banking association has amended its articles of association as provided in this act, and the Comptroller has granted his certificate of approval, any shareholder not assenting to such amendment may give notice in writing to the directors, within thirty days from the date of the certificate of approval, of his desire to withdraw from said association, in which case he shall be entitled to receive from said banking association the value of the shares so held by him, to be ascertained by an appraisal made by a committee of three persons, one to be selected by such shareholder, one by the directors, and the third by the first two; and in case the value so fixed shall not be satisfactory to any such shareholder, he may appeal to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall cause a reappraisal to be made, which shall be final and binding; and if said reappraisal shall exceed the value fixed by said committee, the bank shall pay the expenses of said reappraisal, and otherwise the appellant shall pay said expenses; and the value so ascertained and determined shall be deemed to be a debt due, and be forthwith paid, to said shareholder, from said bank; and the shares so surrendered and appraised shall, after due notice, be sold at public sale, within thirty days after the final appraisal provided in this section: Provided, That in the organization of any banking association intended to replace any existing banking association, and retaining the name thereof, the holders of stock in the expiring association shall be entitled to preference in the allotment of the shares of the new association in proportion to the number of shares held by them respectively in the expiring association.

SEC. 6. That the circulating notes of any association so extending the period of its succession which shall have been issued to it prior to such extension shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, as provided in section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of national-bank currency, and for other purposes," and such notes when redeemed shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency, and destroyed, as now provided by law; and at the end of three years from the date of the extension of the corporate existence of each bank the association so extended shall deposit lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States sufficient to redeem the remainder of the circulation which was outstanding at the date of its extension, as provided in sections 5222, 5224, and 5225 of the Revised Statutes; and any gain that may arise from the failure to present such circulating notes for redemption shall inure to the benefit of the United States; and from time to time, as such notes are redeemed or lawful money deposited therefor, as provided herein, new circulating notes shall be used as provided by this act, bearing such devices, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, as shall make them readily distinguishable from the circulating notes heretofore issued: Provided, however, That each banking association which shall obtain the benefit of this act shall reimburse to the Treasury the cost of preparing the plate or plates for such new circulating notes as shall be issued to it.

SEC. 7. That national banking associations whose corporate existence has expired or shall hereafter expire, and which do not avail themselves of the provisions of this act, shall be required to comply with the provisions of sections 5221 and 5222 of the Revised Statutes in the same manner as if the shareholders had voted to go into liquidation, as provided in section 5220 of the Revised Statutes; and the provisions of sections 5224 and 5225 of the Revised Statutes shall also be applicable to such associations, except as modified by this act; and the franchise of such association is hereby extended for the sole purpose of liquidating their affairs until such affairs are finally closed.

SEC. 8. That national banks now organized or hereafter organized, having a capital of $150,000 or less, shall not be required to keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States United States bonds in excess of one-fourth of their capital stock as security for their circulating notes; and such banks shall keep on deposit or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States the amount of bonds as herein required; and such of those banks having on deposit bonds in excess of that amount are authorized to reduce their circulation by the deposit of lawful money as provided by law: Provided, That the amount of such circulating notes shall not exceed in any case 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited as herein provided: Provided further, That all national banks which shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the retirement in full of their circulation shall, at the time of their deposit, be assessed for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes then outstanding, a sum equal to the average cost of the redemption of national-bank notes during the preceding year, and shall thereupon pay such assessment; and all national banks which have heretofore made or shall hereafter make deposits of lawful money for the reduction of their circulation shall be assessed and shall pay an assessment in the manner specified in section 3 of the act approved June 20, 1874, for the cost of transporting and redeeming their notes redeemed from such deposits subsequently to June 30, 1881.

SEC. 9. That any national banking association now organized, or hereafter organized, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, upon a deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States, as provided in section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of national-bank currency, and for other purposes," or as provided in this act, is authorized to deposit lawful money and withdraw a proportionate amount of the bonds held as security for its circulating notes in the order of such deposits; and no national bank which makes any deposit of lawful money in order to withdraw its circulating notes shall be entitled to receive any increase of its circulation for the period of six months from the time it made such deposit of lawful money for the purpose aforesaid: Provided, That not more than three millions of dollars of lawful money shall be deposited during any calendar month for this purpose: And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to bonds called for redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, nor to the withdrawal of circulating notes in consequence thereof.

SEC. 10. That upon a deposit of bonds as described by sections 5159 and 5160, except as modified by section 4 of an act entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, and as modified by section 8 of this act, the association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as hereinafter provided, equal in amount to 90 per cent. of the current market value, not exceeding part of the United States bonds so transferred and delivered, and at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed 90 per cent. of the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock; and the provisions of sections 5171 and 5176 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any bonds of the United States bearing 3½ per cent. interest, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of registered bonds of the United States of the denominations of fifty, one hundred, five hundred, one thousand, and ten thousand dollars, of such form as he may prescribe, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly at the Treasury of the United States. Such bonds shall be exempt from all taxation by or under State authority, and be payable at the pleasure of the United States: Provided, That the bonds herein authorized shall not be called in and paid so long as any bonds of the United States heretofore issued bearing a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent. and which shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States shall be outstanding and uncalled. The last of the said bonds originally issued under this act, and their substitutes, shall be first called in, and this order of payment shall be followed until all shall have been paid.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin with the Treasurer or assistant treasurers of the United States, in sums not less than $20, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20 each, corresponding with the denominations of United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. Said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and such certificates, as also silver certificates, when held by any national banking association, shall be counted as part of its lawful reserve; and no national banking association shall be a member of any clearing-house in which such certificates shall not be receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000; and the provisions of section 5207 of the Revised Statutes shall be applicable to the certificates herein authorized and directed to be issued.

SEC. 13. That any officer, clerk, or agent of any national banking association who shall willfully violate the provisions of an act entitled "An act in reference to certifying checks by national banks," approved March 3, 1869, being section 5208 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or who shall resort to any device, or receive any fictitious obligation, direct or collateral, in order to evade the provisions thereof, or who shall certify checks before the amount thereof shall have been regularly entered to the credit of the dealer upon the books of the banking association, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof in any circuit or district court of the United States, be fined not more than $5,000 or shall be imprisoned not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. fourteen. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act and the acts of which this is amendatory.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HISCOCK. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. KASSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Texas is entitled to the floor. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 30, line 713, strike out the proviso in the following words:

"That hereafter the duties and investigations of the Board of Health shall be confined to the diseases of cholera and yellow fever."

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of the committee for a few moments, and should be glad to be able to arrest their attention, to the consideration of a feature of our legislation connected with this subject as embodied in the pending bill.

On page 29 it is provided that "the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in case of a threatened or actual epidemic, to use a sum not exceeding $100,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in aid of State and local boards or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same."

On page 30, the section under consideration, it is provided that "for aid to State and local boards of health and to local quarantine stations in carrying out their rules and regulations to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious and infectious diseases in the United States, $25,000" is appropriated, with some provisos attached.

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Appropriations have made provision for this purpose, and I could wish, sir, and it is to that I desired to call the attention of the committee, that the Appropriation Committee had gone even further, and provided for two additional quarantine stations under the legislation upon which this appropriation is based.

It will be remembered that under the sixth section of the act of June 2, 1879, relating to this subject, the power to establish temporary quarantine stations was given to the Board of Health, and one was established at Ship Island, or what was called Mississippi Sound, between New Orleans and Mobile, and equipped. Under it also partial provision was made for equipping the station at Sapolo, on the southern coast of Georgia. A bill had been introduced, reported favorably on by the Committee on Commerce, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with the hope that it would establish a station on the coast of Texas. We should also establish one at some point on the southern coast of Florida, making the two additional stations to which I have referred. There ought to be, in my judgment, four of these stations altogether for the purposes contemplated in the locality mentioned.

I desire, as briefly as I can, although I fear I can do it very insufficiently in the five minutes allotted to me, to ask the consideration of the committee to the necessity which prompts the establishment of these stations. Last year, according to the report of the National Board of Health, it was shown that four ships infected with the yellow fever were treated at the marine station at Ship Island. Either of these ships might have spread the epidemic of yellow fever over our entire coast on its southern borders, and produce an injury to commerce and spread devastation, desolation, and death throughout the South such as was produced in 1878 and 1879 by the terrible epidemic that in these years afflicted our country.

These stations are to contain buildings. They are to be isolated from business places. Under the law the consular reports which are made to the Department are to notify our people when vessels with infectious diseases upon them are cleared from any foreign ports for this country; so that we are always notified when vessels with clean bills of health or those which have not clean bills of health and have diseases upon them are approaching our shores. These vessels then in all cases under the provisions of the law are to be sent to the quarantine stations when infectious diseases are developed upon them, whether they come with a clean bill of health or otherwise.

The mode of treating cases of this kind to prevent the spread of yellow fever and other epidemic diseases is to order the ship which is found to have diseased persons upon it to one of these quarantine stations. There provision is made to put the well in one building apart from the others and the sick in another building, to care for and cure the sick, to preserve the health of the well, and to unload and fumigate the freight, and to fumigate the ship, so as to enable her to proceed upon her voyage without closing ports to the commerce of the country. The advantage of this, Mr. Chairman, is that with regulations of this kind the commerce of the country need not be interrupted in preventing the spread of these fatal diseases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. REAGAN. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Ohio for his kindness. When you remember that for two or three years past the ports of the entire State of Texas—I speak of that alone as an example—were closed for many months against the commerce of the world, it will be seen to what an extent the commerce of the country is thus interfered with under the action of State authorities in preventing the terrible scourge of these diseases. If they can be prevented and kept out without this interruption to commerce we will have gained a great point. If we had had one of these marine stations on the coast we could have sent infected ships from the West Indies, from Mexico, from Central and South America, there to be treated, and have protected the people against these diseases. It would not have prevented the entrance into the ports there of ships from Europe, of ships from Boston, from New York, from Philadelphia, and elsewhere, where there was no such infectious disease, and the commerce of the country would substantially go on, the people being protected to the infinite advantage of the country.

I have, sir, a report to the surgeon-general of the State of Louisiana, estimating the loss by one of these scourges for the whole country at $175,000,000. When we think of the extent of these losses, when we think of the desolation of families and of households, the driving of thousands of people from their business, of children left without parents, of parents bereft of children, with all the suffering and losses that come from these causes, is it not worthy the attention of the Government to take a step which will cost so little as the establishment of these four stations would cost in preventing such terrible disease, and in aiding, fostering, and protecting the commercial interests of the country?

If it be objected, the States should do this and the Federal Government should not, I have this observation to make: it is not in the power of the States to do it completely. The Federal Government alone can call for consular reports, can control and direct ships bearing the commerce of the world to points where they may be disinfected. I think, sir, it is necessary that Federal power should be interposed in this respect to aid the States in protecting our people. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand the gentleman from Texas to be quite satisfied with the bill as it is, except that he desires the establishment of an additional quarantine station on the southern coast by provision of this bill or otherwise. Do I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. REAGAN. I will not ask now to have any amendment. I am glad the committee have gone as far as they have; and it was more my object to call attention to the subject, so that before the 1st of July, 1883, when this legislation by its own limitation expires, Congress may revive and invigorate the policy I have indicated.

I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks a short report made by me during the present session on this subject.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1668) to provide for a quarantine station on the coast of Texas, report the bill back to the House and ask that this report be printed, and that the bill and report be committed to the Committee on Appropriations with the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce for an appropriation, to be made in the proper general appropriation bill, to carry out the purpose of this bill.

The sixth section of the act of July 1, 1879, referred to in the accompanying bill, is as follows, namely:

"That section 3 of the act of June 2, 1879, entitled 'An act to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases within the United States,' be amended as follows: At the end thereof insert: 'And the Board of Health shall have power, when they deem it necessary, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as a means of preventing the importation of contagious and infectious diseases into the United States, or into any State from another, to erect temporary quarantine buildings, and to acquire, on behalf of the United States, titles to real estate for that purpose, or to rent houses, if they be suitable, at such points and places as are named in such section.'"

Under this section two quarantine stations have been established; one at Sapelo, on Black Beard Island on the coast of Georgia, partially equipped, and one on Ship Island, on the southern coast of Mississippi, more fully equipped, while temporary assistance has been rendered at Norfolk, Virginia, Pensacola, Florida, and at Pascagoula, Mississippi.

At Sapelo and Ship Island, for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the legislation of Congress on this subject, provisions are made for the care of the sick in isolated quarters; for the safety of the well of crews of infected ships; isolated anchorage for infected vessels; for unloading and fumigating their cargoes; the use of disinfectants on such vessels, &c.; the object being to prevent the introduction into the country of yellow fever, cholera, small-pox, or other epidemic or infectious diseases from abroad, and so to prevent their spread in the country, and to avoid their ravages and prevent the interruption of commercial intercourse with other countries; to prevent and avoid such disasters, loss of life, and commercial ruin as occurred on the coasts of the Gulf of Mexico and along the Mississippi Valley in the years 1878 and 1879, when so many thousands of people perished by yellow fever, whole families in some instances dying, in others children being deprived of their parents, and in thousands of cases families having to abandon their homes and go to distant places, at great cost and at the sacrifice of their business and property interests, to escape this dreadful scourge; and when during many months the commerce and trade of those regions was suspended, to their almost incalculable damage, very largely affecting a great portion of the commerce of the United States and to a considerable extent our foreign trade. And in addition to the great sacrifice of the lives of people and their terrible sufferings, millions of dollars were lost to our people and to the general trade and business of the country.

To illustrate the foregoing the following extract from the report of the State board of health of Louisiana for the year 1878 is given. The approximate estimates therein given are for the city of New Orleans alone. They enable us to form some estimate of the vast damage which was suffered during the years 1878 and 1879 by the States of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and other States on the seaboard and along the valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries:

Cost of the yellow-fever epidemics of 1878 to the city of New Orleans.

Estimated number of cases	25,000
Cost of ten days' sickness of each one, at $3 per day	$750,000
Cost of 4,500 funerals, at $25 each	112,500
About two-fifths of the 4,500 victims represent each a capital value of $1,000, amounting to	1,800,000
Remaining three-fifths, at $300, amount to	810,000
Loss of time of half the industrial population, say 20,000 people, for 90 days, at $2 per day	3,600,000
Values destroyed by the epidemics	7,072,500
Commercial losses by interruption of intercourse with the surrounding country and diversion of trade to other cities	5,000,000
Total losses	12,072,500
Estimated profits of the summer trade with ports where yellow fever usually prevails	1,572,500

The difference between these two sums, say $10,500,000, represents the actual cost of the epidemic to the material resources of New Orleans.

These figures, made upon a basis deemed moderate in all particulars, show that a trade during half the year with certain tropical ports, and worth to our city $1,500,000, is held at a risk of more than $12,000,000, the actual loss of 1878 from yellow fever. An estimate of the total loss to our country from this epidemic has been made by Mr. A. B. Farquhar, in a letter to Surgeon-General Woodworth, in which he places it at the enormous sum of $175,000,000.

However efficient State quarantine laws and State quarantine officers may be in dealing with this problem within the States, they are to a large extent powerless to deal with the question of preventing the introduction of infectious and epidemic diseases into the country from abroad, for the reason that to do this involves at least partial control and regulation of our foreign commerce, which is confided by the Constitution to Congress alone.

Under section 3 of the act of June 2, 1879, "to prevent the introduction of contagious and infectious diseases into the United States," the National Board of Health is authorized to prescribe "such rules as are authorized by the laws of the United States and are necessary to be observed by vessels at the port of departure and on the voyage when such vessel sails from any foreign port or place at which contagious or infectious disease exists, to any port or place in the United States, to secure the best sanitary conditions of such vessel, her cargo, passengers, and crew."

Under section 5 of the same act the National Board of Health is empowered to adopt "all such other rules and regulations as shall be observed on the inspection of the same on the arrival thereof at any quarantine station at the port of destination, and for the disinfection and isolation of the same, and the treatment of cargo and persons on board, so as to prevent the introduction of cholera, yellow fever, and other contagious diseases."

The importance and necessity of passing this bill into a law will be better understood when it is stated that the distance from the quarantine station at Ship Island to Brazos Santiago, on the southern coast of Texas, is about eight hundred miles, not computing indentations of the coast; and that such a station properly located on the coast of Texas would furnish the desired protection against the introduction of such diseases into the ports of Calcasieu, Louisiana, and Sabine Pass, Galveston, Nelasco, Pass Cavallo, Arkansas Pass, and Brazos Santiago and the coast of Texas, these ports having a large trade with the West India Islands, Mexico, and South American ports, from which yellow fever is liable to be brought at almost any time, and a large trade with other parts of the United States and with foreign countries, which would be seriously interrupted by the existence of yellow fever in the ports intended to be protected by this bill.

A brief reference to the amount and to the rapid growth of the commerce of Galveston, one of the ports above mentioned, without referring to the considerable commerce of the other six ports, will tend to illustrate this point.

The population of Galveston is about 27,000. Sales of merchandise for the year ending December 31, 1881, were $37,755,000. The imports and exports for the last fiscal year were about $30,000,000 in value.

The number and tonnage of vessels entered and cleared in the foreign trade of Galveston during the year ending June 30, 1881, and their tonnage were as follows:

	Number.	Tons.
Entered	278	215,311
Cleared	262	183,349

without reference to the vessels engaged in the domestic trade.

There were entered at the custom-house in Galveston during the month of November, 1881, in a single month, a total of 118 vessels, with a tonnage of 80,262 tons. In addition to this there were twenty-three trips made by steamers in the local trade, of which there were no entries made in the custom-house. The above does not include the hundreds of crafts, large and small, which constantly ply along the coast and up the rivers and bayous. Of the vessels entered during that month, 66 were from domestic ports and 52 were from foreign ports; 35 were steamships, 2 were ships, 42 were barks, 14 were brigs, and 25 were schooners.

The receipts of customs at the port of Galveston were:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879	$68,991 30
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880	336,632 34
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881	1,551,333 49

	Per cent.
Increase of 1880 over 1879	400
Increase of 1881 over 1880	360
Increase of 1881 over 1879	2,150

And the receipts of the customs at the port of Galveston for the first six months of the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1881, were $847,669.34. The necessity of some such action as this to protect the vast population and commerce which it is the purpose of this bill to protect is so great that it ought not to be delayed. Its cost would be almost as nothing compared with the benefits which may flow from it. The inability of the States to deal with the whole problem is manifest; and both feelings of humanity and regard for the public interests require this precaution for the public safety.

During last year, we are informed by the National Board of Health, four vessels from foreign ports infected with yellow fever were treated at the present quarantine stations, either of which might, without such treatment, have started in our country this dreadful scourge; and once started who could foretell that the result, in addition to the loss of life and suffering which would have followed, might not have cost the country thousands of times more than the cost of the proposed protection?

Appended hereto is a memorandum from the office of the National Board of Health, giving an estimate of the items of expense which make up the $50,000 proposed to be appropriated by this bill. Your committee add that this appropriation is recommended by the National Board of Health, and a like recommendation was made by it to the Forty-sixth Congress.

Necessary buildings and fixtures for refuge station.

For furniture, &c	5,000
Total estimate for establishment	50,000

Mr. CONVERSE. I had the honor of submitting an amendment to strike out the proviso, and called upon the chairman of the committee for information as to why this proviso was inserted. So far I have received no information on that subject.

Mr. HISCOCK rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to make a suggestion or two, and then I will yield. There is no proposition before the committee to abolish this Board of Health. There is in this bill an appropriation with this $25,000 of $42,000 altogether. This proviso limits the investigation to two single diseases throughout the country, namely, yellow fever and cholera. Suppose, Mr. Chairman, we do not have either this year, is this board to receive the $42,000 and have nothing to do, nothing to investigate, nothing to look after until either cholera or yellow fever comes?

Why limit their investigation? What is the necessity for it? There are other diseases in the country almost as fatal as either of these. What is the necessity of tying up the hands of this board after making the appropriation, after calling it into existence, and keeping it in existence? Why is it necessary to tie their hands and say they shall not investigate anything else except these two diseases? There is the typhus fever, which is as fatal as either of these. There is the cold plague, which we have been visited with once, and which within the last two or three years has visited Europe, and to such an extent they were obliged to call out the military to keep within certain bounds the infected persons, and to prevent its spread. These diseases may visit our own country. Why tie the hands of these men in this bill and say they shall not investigate any other save and except these two diseases?

It seems to me we should strike out this proviso if we are to retain the board and if we are to make the appropriations; and if they have not got any yellow fever or any cholera to prevent the spread of, let them turn their attention to something else. Let them be busy. There is enough to investigate. I hope either the proviso will be stricken out or else this entire appropriation of $25,000 will be stricken out; one or the other.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move to strike out the last word. When the law was passed creating the National Board of Health there was a clear intention on the part of Congress as to the subjects to which the Board of Health should devote its attention. It was created, as I remember it, as a scientific board for the purpose of determining the character of yellow fever and perhaps of cholera, as to its being what is known as a germ disease, or whether it was propagated in some other way; as to its being indigenous to the United States, and generally for the purpose of giving information on the subject to the people of the United States.

It was an investigating board; it was intended to be nothing else except an investigating board. And eminent men in their profession were indicated for places on the board, not to give their time and attention to the building up of a great quarantine system in the United States but to obtain and disseminate throughout the country scientific knowledge upon the subject. I call attention of gentlemen to the language of the original act:

The duties of the National Board of Health shall be to obtain information upon all matters affecting the public health; to advise the several Departments of the Government, the executives of the several States, and the commissioners of the District of Columbia on all questions submitted to them, whenever in the opinion of the board such advice may tend to the preservation and improvement of the public health; that the board, with the assistance of the Academy of Science, is hereby requested and directed to co-operate with them for that purpose and report to Congress.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. Has not that law been changed, and the powers of the board enlarged?

Mr. HISCOCK. That law was changed at the extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. DUNN. After the epidemic of the yellow fever?

Mr. HISCOCK. When it became a settled fact that we had the yellow fever in the United States the powers of the board were enlarged temporarily, and it was intended that the enlargement of the powers should be temporary. The board was authorized to erect temporary quarantine stations at different places; and the act which extended their jurisdiction, I believe, expires in June, 1883. The power was given to them only temporarily, and was so intended.

The original purpose for which the board was created was for scientific investigation of one or perhaps two diseases, cholera and yellow fever. The prominent object in the public mind and in the mind of Congress at the time was the investigation of yellow fever. One of the questions which the board was to investigate was what should be done to destroy the germs of the fever in ships, buildings, &c. That was one of the subjects of their investigation, and they were limited in their investigation. Having once been created, the board now seeks to extend its power and perpetuate itself.

Mr. CONVERSE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. CONVERSE. If I heard the gentleman aright when he read the law creating this Board of Health, the law stated that they were to inquire as to all subjects affecting the public health.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is true.

Mr. CONVERSE. Why, then, has the gentleman now undertaken to limit that power of investigation to two diseases only?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will answer that question. At the time that Congress passed this law, as I have stated, it was the intention to limit the operations of this board to the one disease which Congress had in mind, and the board was authorized to make examinations in regard to but two diseases; its jurisdiction was for investigation only. It was to take jurisdiction of great epidemics that sweep over entire States and sections of the country, not diseases that are confined to small territories and can be taken control of by the States, but diseases which pass beyond State lines and involve great sections of country, and which may be said to have the country for its area. It was to grapple with some such great national catastrophe as that that the board was created.

We all remember the debate which was had on the subject. As to local diseases, confined to counties or to States, if you please, it never was the intention of Congress that this board should take jurisdiction of them or proceed to make investigations concerning them. [Here the hammer fell.] I hope some gentleman will yield to me some time.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, and Mr. ROBESON rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say a word or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK.]

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. And so did I.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to call the attention of the House to some matters bearing upon the statement I have made. Now, in regard to the members of the Board of Health. After you get outside of the Army they are Samuel H. Bemiss, of New Orleans, Louisiana; Henry I. Bowditch, of Boston, Massachusetts; James L. Cabell, University of Virginia; Hosmer A. Johnson, Chicago, Illinois; Robert W. Mitchell, Memphis, Tennessee; Stephen Smith, of New York City, and Thomas S. Verdi, Washington, District of Columbia. The members of the board were taken from widely separated sections of the country, and it never was the intention of Congress that the board should locate here in the city of Washington.

I do not know that it has ever located here in the city of Washington. I am not aware that these distinguished gentlemen have ever located or acquired a residence in the city of Washington for the purpose of giving their whole time and attention to this investigation or to the building up of a quarantine system. It is a sort of advisory board.

Mr. REAGAN. As a matter of fact they have been located here and have their offices here.

Mr. HISCOCK. I know they have their offices here. Have they taken up their personal residence here?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know.

Mr. HISCOCK. No one says that they have, and it is not necessary.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I think none but the secretary of the board resides here.

Mr. HISCOCK. The secretary of the board resides here, I am told.

Mr. REAGAN. And the president of the board.

Mr. HISCOCK. The president of the board is connected with the University of Virginia; and does the gentleman tell me that he has ever resigned the presidency of that institution, or that his personal attention is not given to the management of its affairs?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that all his time is given to the duties of this board; but when I have wanted to confer with him I have always been able to do it at his office here.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no doubt that during a large portion of the time when Congress is in session—certainly when appropriation bills are under consideration—you can find several of the members of the board here.

Mr. Chairman, every gentleman here will attest the truth of the remark when I say that the moment you create any board of this kind it seeks to enlarge its powers. Finding this condition of things with reference to the Board of Health, we have sought to restrict its operations to what were originally intended. It was stated on this floor yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] that this board is seeking to put its stamp or mark upon every particle of vaccine matter which is to be sold and used in the United States; and from what the gentleman said I understood that he favored so monstrous a proposition.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. The gentleman does not want to misstate what I said?

Mr. HISCOCK. I have not intended to misstate it. I know that there are pending before Congress bills providing that this board shall act as inspectors of vaccine matter, and substantially control its sale. I have heard that proposition agitated.

One word more. If we are to have a board of health that is to exercise quarantine jurisdiction, it would be the duty of Congress, in my judgment, to build up the Marine-Hospital Service rather than this board. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ATKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. We have built hospitals in connection with this Marine-Hospital Service in nearly all our principal sea-ports. The service is well organized, and the Committee on Appropriations has been liberal in regard to it in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ATKINS. I yield for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to finish his sentence; but it is a very long one.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Committee on Commerce, adopting the suggestion of Dr. Hamilton, have recommended us to be liberal in our appropriations to the Marine-Hospital Service. And wherever we have found a sea-port where there was in our judgment an adequate demand to justify the establishment of a marine hospital we have authorized it. As I have said, these hospitals now exist in almost every one of our leading sea-ports. By this bill we have given one to Baltimore, one to New Orleans, one to Cairo, and one to the Pacific coast. If any system of this kind is to be built up, we should take a system that we already have and give it the necessary power and jurisdiction; not create a rival board, which must cause increased expense.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the range of this debate has included seemingly the propriety of this whole appropriation; but there is no question of that sort before the Committee of the Whole. The question now presented is confined in its narrow limits to striking out the proviso of the paragraph, which proposes to limit the appropriation to the investigation of the two diseases, cholera and yellow fever. Yesterday I favored the proviso; but after gentlemen from the Northern States insisted that the ravages of small-pox were so great in many of those States that it was a proper step for this Board of Health to investigate that disease, and that its services would be of avail in stopping those ravages, I was, for one, willing—and I so said to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—that the investigation should be made.

I rose mainly to say that I trust the discussion of the diseases which this Board of Health shall investigate will not prejudice the House against the whole appropriation. It is true the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] has not made any motion, nor has any one else, to reduce the appropriation below that proposed in the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not believe any such motion will be made.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope not; but I was going to say that if my friend from New York spoke much longer he would probably persuade himself or somebody else to make that motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman need have no alarm on that subject.

Mr. ATKINS. I was going to say, if that proposition were made, what I attempted to say yesterday—that when the yellow fever was ravaging the South three or four years ago, and the city of Memphis, in my own State, was stricken as never a city was before, the people from all over the North, with a liberality, a munificence, that was absolutely sublime, and a sympathy that touched every heart in the South, poured out their money for the relief of the Southern people; and if the Committee of the Whole should now strike out this appropriation and the yellow fever should again visit our section of the country, it would cost you gentlemen a great deal more than the amount here proposed; for I know that in your liberality you would from your private purses pour out upon the people of the Southern States far more than this appropriation would give them.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that in the discussions upon this portion of the bill they will be limited at all events to the proposition to strike out the provision, and not the amount of the appropriation. Now, I am willing that the proviso shall stand or go out. I have a very accommodating spirit. I am an accommodating man; and shall not stand upon that point. I am willing to yield to the majority upon that subject, but I do not want the debate to drift into a point where it shall reach the discussion of the merits, and lose sight of the original object of the discussion. [Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the pro forma amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. ROBESON. I renew it. I think, Mr. Chairman, that with reference to the general purposes of this bill upon this subject there is a little misunderstanding. There are two branches of this subject, one being the provision which has relation to the introduction and spread of contagious diseases; and the other is the investigation of the causes which produce them, and of the specific remedies which are to suppress or prevent them. In this bill we have provided that the President shall be authorized to use $100,000 of the amount appropriated by this bill in case of the introduction into this country of any contagious diseases, or in case of a threatened or actual epidemic, and that he may use it through any local, State, or official agencies at his discretion to suppress it. For that purpose, therefore, we have made ample provision in the bill, even if these diseases shall only threaten. Now, we provide also $25,000 for another purpose. We provide this to enable the scientific Board of Health to investigate certain diseases—merely to investigate—and we believe that amount to be sufficient. We have also confined the investigation to yellow fever and to cholera, because the germs of these diseases are unknown, and because the specifics which are to meet and destroy them are yet undiscovered. In the case of small-pox the whole origin and history of that disease is thoroughly understood. Since Dr. Jenner lived and died, some half a century ago, the whole civilized world has accepted vaccination and isolation as the effectual specifics against the spread of that loathsome disease. What can the investigations of this board add to that?

Again, Mr. Chairman, there are other diseases which are deadly in their nature and infectious in their quality. But they also are thoroughly understood. Their specifics have been ascertained and applied, their nature has been comprehended, their germs are known, but the great scourges of cholera and yellow fever are as yet utterly unknown. Where they have their origin, and the influences through which they spread their deadly poison, are as yet undiscovered, and I wish, sir, that this board would focus all their scientific zeal and use all of the money that can be given to them under such an appropriation in order to determine, if they can, the secrets of the origin of these diseases and bring out from the resources of nature and the great alembics which God has given to the earth the means of destroying their deadly power over human life. I hope they will be confined to these subjects.

Do not let them scatter their investigations all over the States and take into consideration all varieties of disease that are already well understood. Let them concentrate all their power and bring all their scientific resources upon these material points. That is what we seek to do in this bill instead of encouraging local specialists all over the country to waste the money we have given to them without materially advancing the great national object that they seek to accomplish. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from New York has, I think, fully presented the purposes of this bill in connection with the Board of Health. The first statute bearing upon that subject was passed on March 3, 1879, entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of infectious or contagious diseases into the United States, and to establish a national board of health." That national board of health was charged simply with the duty of obtaining information upon all matters affecting the public health and of advising the several Departments of the Government, the executives of the several States, and the commissioners of the District of Columbia what might be done to preserve the public health. In addition to that they were directed to report in connection with the Academy of Science, which was requested to co-operate, a plan for a national board of health. If such report has been made Congress has failed to take further action, and the other, by the failure to provide a substitute for it, has expired. In June of that year an act was passed to provide against the introduction of infectious and contagious diseases into the United States. This supplementary act of June, 1879, was simply to provide for the prevention of contagious or infectious diseases in the United States, and the diseases they had in mind were cholera and yellow fever.

By the eighth section of the act an appropriation of $500,000 was made, which might be used under the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury on estimates made to him by the Board of Health and approved by him. Otherwise it could not be used at all. This statute has not been observed by the Board of Health at all.

The last section of the act shows, however, the temporary character of the provision, for it declares that it shall not continue in force for a period longer than four years from the date of its passage, showing that it was the intention of Congress, after four years of operation of the Board of Health in this connection, that it should cease to exist. By virtue of that statute it will have reached the period of its life in June of next year. Therefore my friend from New York has stated rightly that it was intended to be temporary in its character, and that it had in view simply the consideration of these two diseases. We have therefore thought it was our duty to keep constantly in view the temporary character of the board and the limited purposes for which it was created. So far as extending it goes, I think Congress rightly considered that localities had some capacity and power to take care of themselves, and I think they may still be relied upon in that respect.

My friend from Arkansas, [Mr. DUNN,] in his remarks on this subject yesterday, took occasion to remark that I was disposed to object to this measure on the ground of economy. My friend quite misunderstood the nature of my objection at that time. So far as this provision is concerned, if it came in apart from the others as a separate provision, I would be willing to see every item of legislation existing or proposed in this bill abolished, and a permanent appropriation, if need be, of $1,000,000, not to be covered into the Treasury at any time, put into the hands of the Chief Executive of the nation, to be used in an emergency to meet such epidemics.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is understood to be withdrawn, and the question recurs on the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to amend the bill by striking out the last proviso of the pending paragraph.

Mr. CONVERSE. I offer a formal amendment for the purpose of occupying one minute in reply. I think five speeches have been delivered on the other side.

I desire to dissent in toto from the views expressed by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.] It is not true that the other diseases of the country are understood, and that they are easily remedied by local treatment. Instead of that being true, I desire to state what I believe to be the fact, that the ravages of other fevers that are contagious or infectious in their character in the United States have for every year in the last ten years exceeded the destruction from yellow fever or from cholera. Will the gentleman pretend that he knows and that the country knows the causes of typhus fever? Will he pretend to say the country or the profession know the causes or the remedies for scarletina, which is more destructive of human life than the cholera? How is it on the subject of diphtheria?

Gentlemen are ready to appropriate $50,000 to investigate a cattle disease. But here are diseases that are desolating the human family, and that are infectious in their character; and when you have got a board competent to investigate, you want by this bill to tie up their hands so they shall not investigate anything except as to two particular diseases.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words:

"And provided further, That hereafter the duties and investigations of the Board of Health shall be confined to the diseases of cholera and yellow fever."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 30, noes 35.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out the whole paragraph from line 707 to line 716, inclusive.

Mr. PEELLE. Before the motion to strike out is entertained I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "cholera" insert the word "small-pox."

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That has already been submitted and voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. PEELLE. I think it highly proper this amendment should be adopted. The information I have received from my State prompts me to offer it.

I am not prepared, Mr. Chairman, to disagree with what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] From their words I infer they have investigated this matter more carefully than I have done. But I think I can disagree with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] when he says that all these diseases except two are pretty generally understood in this country by the physicians. I am in receipt of a letter from the secretary of the board of health in the city of Indianapolis, in which, speaking of the reduction of the appropriation and the limitation which this bill seeks to place upon the national board in their researches, he uses this language:

I hope that such a reduction will not be made. The United States has suffered much more from the introduction of small-pox during the last year than from both cholera and yellow fever. Our own State and city have suffered severely from the introduction of small-pox within the last year. The National Board of Health have appointed a number of inspectors of the immigrants at the principal railroad stations east of us, and I think that such inspectors should be maintained.

The sentiment expressed in that letter is but the sentiment expressed in letters from several sources in my State that I have received; and it is for that reason I offer this amendment to include at least small-pox as one of the diseases to be investigated by this board. I believe that that disease has affected the Northern and Northwestern States more than any other disease, and certainly more than cholera and the yellow fever; and if the National Board of Health is to be an institution from which benefit is to be derived throughout the whole country, it does seem to me that this amendment should prevail.

Mr. LORD. I desire to support the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PEELLE.] I represent, in part, a State with more than a thousand miles of frontier, across which diseased men are shipped by other countries into the United States, for the very reason, and for that reason only, that they are diseased. We are exposed, largely exposed, to other diseases than yellow fever and cholera. What the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, read from the statute in which the first steps were taken in this direction rather led me, contrary to the purpose for which he adduced it, to believe that the intention was the Board of Health should exercise a supervision and a care over all contagious diseases. I differ with that gentleman also when he states as an argument in favor of confining the examinations and instrumentalities of this Board of Health to those two diseases that they are general while the others are local in character. I wish to call his attention to the fact that diphtheria and small-pox and scarlet fever sweep over vast areas of country, as compared with yellow fever and the cholera. Not only that, but they carry to the grave vast numbers as compared with either of those diseases. It does appear to me that this appropriation, tiny as it is, should be permitted to have its scope on the diseases to which the whole country is subjected and from which it is in danger.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has called attention to the fact that the consular agents and consular officers in their reports will call the attention of this country to the danger of contagious diseases. But unless they shall call attention to those two diseases, yellow fever and cholera, their notifications can have no effect under this law. The Board of Health, through its agents in the various States, cannot call attention to other diseases because they will be excluded by this provision which the committee has decided by vote not to strike out. I do hope the appropriation, tiny as it is, may include all the diseases, because, tiny as it is, it is important as a correlative and auxiliary matter to what the States are attempting to do in the direction I have suggested.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is now pending an amendment and an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. To insert "small-pox" after the word "cholera," in line 715.

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the only amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error; that is the only amendment pending.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word. I wish to detain the committee but a moment. I am in favor of the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PEELLE.] I want to make one suggestion in addition to the excellent statement which that gentleman made.

The proposed amendment will not increase the expenditures of the Board of Health, for this reason: yellow fever and cholera prevail in the summer time, small-pox prevails in the winter time. Therefore this National Board of Health can be engaged in the examination of the disease of small-pox as an epidemic disease when it is not engaged in the examination of the other two diseases.

I speak particularly for our State, where the disease of small-pox was so prevalent last winter. In fact it was so prevalent in several of the Northern States last winter that the National Board of Health considered seriously the propriety of declaring it an epidemic. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will be adopted.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to say but a word or two. It seems strange to me that the Committee of the Whole should have been willing to leave this clause in the bill as it now stands. I think there is nothing, as I suppose the committee knows, upon which this National Board of Health has done so much during the past year as upon this subject of small-pox.

That disease has been prevalent in the Western States, my own city and State, in Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan. There have been many villages in those States almost devastated. For three months in succession business has been almost entirely stopped in some places by this dread disease, which was uncontrollable until the National Board of Health took hold of it, and exercised its power to stop the trains, take off those who were afflicted with the small-pox, house them and cure them, and in that way prevent its spread.

Now, when they are doing some good, to strike down the appropriations for their continuance seems to me to show conclusively that the Committee on Appropriations desires only to destroy the board entirely. I commend the sentiments of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.] They are worthy of him and of those who would return somewhat in kind, so far as they can, to the North, and especially to the Northwestern States, the assistance which they rendered them in their time of need. I believe it is only a fair and righteous thing to do, and I hope this House will see that it is a proper thing to do to vote for this amendment and continue this National Board of Health in its course of well-doing.

Our State boards have written to us and commended this thing to us. It is said that the State boards can take care of this matter themselves. They found they could not take care of it and they called upon the National Board of Health, and that board rendered them most valuable assistance.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I renew it for the purpose of saying only a word. I do not agree with my colleague from Illinois that this amendment should be made.

For one I want to state again, even at the expense of repeating myself, what I have before stated. The State of New York has exercised its police powers so that she protects herself. The State of Illinois has the same powers; it has a public board of health. I am sorry to see these great Commonwealths, rich in intelligence and money and enterprise and vigilance, clamoring for this appropriation. We have the power and the disposition, the money and the intelligence, to protect ourselves.

Mr. ALDRICH. We are not asking for an extra appropriation now.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, you are.

Mr. ALDRICH. The appropriation is already in the bill, though altogether too small.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say again that I believe in calling upon the power of the Federal Government where it is necessary that it should be exercised. But I deprecate as bad policy this running to the Federal Government and fastening upon the Federal Treasury, and organizing boards with their loose and inefficient management, a thousand or two thousand miles away from the evil to be cured. The gods help them who help themselves.

Our great and powerful Commonwealths have the ability and intelligence and disposition to take care of themselves, and let them do it where the matter can be properly superintended. Let this National Board of Health, which in my opinion ought not to exist, but as it must exist, let it regulate matters touching these two epidemics, and let the President use the $100,000 which is given him by this bill through the Board of Health if he wants to, or through the Marine-Hospital Service, or any other means that he may desire to use, and that will be effective.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is simply what I have said; the gentleman does not want this board to be useful at all. The speech he has made should have been made a hundred years ago.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, and will bear making, as all true speeches will, at all times. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PEELLE] to insert in line 715, after the word "cholera," the words "small-pox."

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 64, noes 31.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from lines 707 to 716 as amended, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For aid to State and local boards of health and to local quarantine stations in carrying out their rules and regulations to prevent the introduction and spread of contagious and infectious diseases in the United States, $5,000: Provided, That no other public money than that hereby appropriated shall be expended for the purposes of the Board of Health: And provided further, That hereafter the duties and investigations of the Board of Health shall be confined to the diseases of cholera and yellow fever: And provided further, That from and after the 1st of September next the acts of March 3, 1879, and June 2, 1879, and July 1, 1879, in relation to the Board of Health are hereby repealed."

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment which I have offered as a substitute for the paragraph proposes to make an appropriation of $5,000 for closing up this business, and provides for the repeal on the 1st of September next of the laws creating this Board of Health. I offer this proposition not so much perhaps with the expectation of succeeding just now in my undertaking as to call the attention of the House to the principle underlying this class of bureaus.

When the bill was passed here, at the time when the yellow fever was prevalent, I was not in favor of that bill without an amendment by which the local quarantine systems of the country should be exempted from this Federal power of control. I believe that this Board of Health, ever since its creation, has trenched upon the functions of the local boards of health as well as the local quarantine of the various States. I believe (and I think it could be demonstrated) that every time one of these State or local boards leans upon the Federal Government for sustenance and support, we lose just that much of pure medical science and progress. These boards are in the habit of drawing when they can upon the Federal Treasury, while, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] well said, (although one gentleman has characterized his speech as a century old,) they ought to rely on themselves for the investigation of disease and their causes, the prevention and suppression of contagious and infectious diseases.

Mr. Chairman, this Board of Health is but one of many symptoms indicative of the aggrandizement and centralization of Federal power. I deny the right of the Federal Government to investigate the causes of disease. It has no more right to investigate small-pox than it has to investigate chicken-pox or the measles. All the right of the Federal Government in this respect is derived from its authority to regulate commerce so as to prevent the incoming of these diseases from abroad. Under our Constitution and our peculiar federal polity the right to adopt health regulations, to take measures in reference to the spread of disease, is a police right of a local character. It has been so regarded by the courts; it has been so treated in Congress in times gone by. This is one reason why Congress never passed a bill of so sweeping and general nature on this subject except under the influence of the argumentum ad misericordiam growing out of the terrible scourge in the Southern States a few years ago. I know the reason, perhaps, why we thus tend toward centralization.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. How can we protect commerce if the Federal Government has not the right to adopt quarantine regulations against those things which would interrupt and destroy commerce?

Mr. COX, of New York. That question has already been answered in a most elaborate debate in this House when we discussed the decision of the Supreme Court defining the line between Federal and local authority.

Mr. ROBESON. The Supreme Court did not pronounce against either; it said they ran together.

Mr. COX, of New York. The distinctions in this respect were then made; and we discussed them. It was, however, held in the debate that in the protection against disease, where quarantine regulations of a local character were already established, this extension of Federal power was a new departure in our constitutional history.

I know that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is a Democrat of strict-construction tendencies. I only wish that his advancement in that regard was equal to that of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] who would never invoke the authority of the Federal Government except when he finds it necessary. I say I would never invoke the Federal power except when I have warrant under the organic law for such invocation. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to appeal to my colleague [Mr. COX, of New York,] to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will withdraw the amendment if the gentleman will let me conclude my remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. I renew the amendment, and yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I will yield my time to my colleague if he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not believe it will be in my power, after this vote upon the question of small-pox, to carry my amendment; but I would like to finish my remarks.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am willing the gentleman should do so. But I will say to the committee I am very anxious if it be possible that we should conclude this bill to-day. If we desire to adjourn on the 17th instant it is necessary the bill should go to the Senate on Monday morning. I yield my time to my colleague.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, having, almost by my own exertions, preserved our local quarantine jurisdiction in New York, which has been so benignant in its operations upon the country, I feel to some extent a personal interest in this question. I wish to lay my opposition to this National Board of Health down upon broad and proper grounds. I know the tendency now (as I was about to remark when interrupted by my time having expired) to increase our Federal functions. I do not know but you and others, Mr. Chairman, may believe, and believe rightfully, we should increase our Federal power. Why do we do it? Why have we since one hundred years ago, referred to by gentlemen on the other side, grown to this system of centralization in matters of pure local police? I find the solution of it in an article from the North American Review, by Carl Schurz, where he speaks about "party schisms and future problems." Although he does not pretend to argue, he does state the present condition of our parties in respect to this division of Federal and local power. I will ask the Clerk to read what I have marked of this article.

The Clerk read as follows.

The old historic question of a centralizing tendency on one and a decentralizing tendency on the other side, or of a strong central power, and of local self-government which the Democratic party, as the advocate of decentralization, was in the habit of advancing as the vital issue of American politics, has also changed so much in some of its most important aspects that the Democratic party itself would hesitate now to put it forward in the old form. The relation of the central Government to the States and the people has been seriously modified during the last fifty years, not only in consequence of the civil war and the constitutional amendments, or of a change in constitutional doctrine, but through the introduction of new means of communication which have annihilated the distances formerly separating the different parts of the country and their people, and through the creation of a community of enterprise and interest between them which formerly did not exist. The inhabitant of Missouri, or even California, when stepping on board of a railroad train, feels himself nearer to the central Government than the inhabitants of central Virginia or of New Jersey did fifty years ago. And the farmer in Nebraska and the stock-raiser in Montana have now as lively an interest in the regulation of railway freight rates through Ohio and New York as in the first quarter of this century the farmer to the nearest market town. The intercourse of the people of the different States is infinitely more intimate, not only because the increased facilities of locomotion encourage travel but because the interest of all classes of business pursuits are, in their various relations, constantly overleaping all geographical and political lines of division, and many of those interests feel themselves in closer contact with the National Government than with any home authority. The American people have, therefore, become more the people of one great country and less the people of a number of different States, and the central Government has become to them even in the remotest corner of the land a thing of vastly greater interest and importance than ever before.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have had that remarkable extract read not because I agree with its conclusions, but it certainly lays bare the fact to the country and the House that, owing to physical causes and geographical obliterations by means of railroad communication, telegraphs, telephones, and scientific progress, we are changing the old mode of interpreting our Constitution. Now, while I deprecate——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. I insist on the bargain being kept.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York withdraws his amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; I withdraw it.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I renew it for the purpose of saying a few words and will then withdraw it. I am very glad to find no member of the Committee on Appropriations is ready to propose such an amendment as that which has been offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and which he has withdrawn. Of course he offered it to give himself an opportunity to make some remarks on the centralization of power, and so on. But I wish to say to this Committee of the Whole, Mr. Chairman, that there is no local board of health in this country of which I have heard of anywhere in any of the great commercial centers of the country, or even off the great commercial centers of the country, which has asked this House to diminish in the least the powers of the National Board of Health. I do not think there is one. I am sure the board of health of the city of Philadelphia has recommended we should appropriate liberally toward the National Board of Health, and I believe that the board of health of the city of New York, if it has not done so already, would be ready to do it if that were deemed necessary. If it be true that we have effective local boards of health, it is also true that this National Board of Health adds to the general effectiveness of the system throughout the country.

It has done great good and why should we now limit it? I of course do not believe Congress would at any time be ready to repeal the law establishing the National Board of Health, but I wish to say here and now, representing in part a commercial city, that in no commercial center could you find a board of health which would recommend this House and Congress to diminish in the least degree the necessary appropriations for the National Board of Health whereby its effectiveness would be destroyed. The weekly bulletins of the National Board of Health are most interesting reading and in every commercial community are anxiously looked for.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we want all these aids for the purpose of preventing the spread of infectious diseases in the country, I care not whether yellow fever, typhoid fever, small-pox, or cholera. I do not see how any gentleman representing a city of the importance of the city of New York in commerce can rise in his place and ask this Committee of the Whole in any gracious way to diminish the necessary powers of the National Board of Health.

There is no city, sir, in this country where the watchfulness of the boards of health is so necessary and important to the well-being of the people as in the city of New York. Why, Mr. Chairman, with all that the National Board of Health and its efforts can accomplish, with all of the efforts of the local boards of health, with all of the efforts of the commissioners of emigration, and their medical officers in the city of New York, they have been unable to keep infectious diseases out of the limits of that city. Diseases of that kind are there all the while, and God only knows how far they would extend were it not for the efforts and the zeal which is manifested by such organizations to keep them isolated from the population in general.

Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that in the city of New York, and that portion which the gentleman represents who offered the amendment, that they cannot now keep down the local diseases which every summer desolate the tenement houses of that city. There are now seven hundred or eight hundred children there dying weekly, or more than a hundred a day, of infectious diseases. I do not see why the gentleman should desire to reduce the amount appropriated for the Board of Health, or why he should seek to abolish the board altogether. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to take up the time of the committee but very briefly, for I dislike to consume any more time upon this subject, but it is proper that I should make a few observations on the subject. It was stated by the gentleman from New York, when on the floor, that the power of the National Goverment over the subject now before us was derived from the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to regulate commerce; and in that the gentleman was undoubtedly correct. That the States have certain local or police powers in this connection no one will pretend to deny, and must be accepted as true, in their proper sphere. Now, the second section of the act of June, 1879, makes provision for a medical inspection of vessels clearing from foreign ports to this country. That section provides:

All such vessels shall be required to obtain from the consul, vice-consul, or other consular officer of the United States at the port of departure, or from the medical officer, where such officer has been detailed by the President for that purpose, a certificate in duplicate setting forth the sanitary history of said vessel, and that it has in all respects complied with the rules and regulations in such cases prescribed for securing the best sanitary condition of the said vessel, its cargo, passengers, and crew; and said consular or medical officer is required, before granting such certificate, to be satisfied the matters and things therein stated are true; and for his services in that behalf he shall be entitled to demand and receive such fees as shall by lawful regulation be allowed, to be accounted for as is required in other cases.

The purpose of this is to advise our people in an authentic and reliable form of the departure of all vessels from the ports of other countries for our shores, which vessels may be infected by disease; and this can only be done under the power to regulate commerce. If the object is to regulate commerce, leaving out the higher purpose of protecting human life, we have but to look at the consequences of some of the epidemics which have visited our country to see how important it is for the Federal Government, if it has power to execute the law, to exercise it in that proper connection for the welfare of all the people. The city of Savannah during the last epidemic, as I had information through the Representative from that district, in addition to the sacrifice of thousands of lives and the desolation of homesteads, lost $5,000,000 of property. While that condition of affairs existed in the city, and when the disease was prevailing there, as a natural consequence the trade from all parts of the country which had concentrated in that great business center fell away and gradually sought other channels. The trade of that important port was seriously crippled by the disaster, and it will be difficult perhaps to fix a limit upon the amount actually lost on that account.

Our whole country was estimated, as I have already said, to have lost by the epidemic of 1878 no less than $175,000,000. The vast trade of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars annually, was turned into other channels. Its vast commerce with Northern cities, its commerce with all of Europe, its commerce with the West Indies, with South America and Central America, and with the Mexican states was arrested and a great injury done to the city which years of patient work will scarcely succeed in repairing.

The port of Galveston, with its $30,000,000 of exports annually, has been closed for a number of years by legislation closing all of the ports against the vessels, of these dread scourges. And not only has it visited the port of Galveston but five or six other points all along our southern coast are forced to sacrifice their commerce annually for the benefit of the health of that part of the country. And this condition of things affects not merely the trade and commerce of the city itself but it affects the trade and commerce of all countries as well as of all of the States that trade with it.

I say this, Mr. Chairman, but to show the necessity for the employment of the power of the Federal Government, so far as it may be constitutionally employed, to aid in preventing the introduction and spread of these terrible scourges. Besides that, sir, I desire to say a word as to the National Board of Health. I have no disposition to see the jurisdiction of the National Board of Health unduly expanded. I am willing to see it limited, as was the first intention of the act which called it into being, so as to confine it to an investigation of the cause and the prevention of epidemic diseases; but I am willing, by such appropriate legislation as may be necessary for the accomplishment of the safety of the life and the health of our people, to put the quarantine stations under the control of the marine-hospital board, so that they may, as was done at Ship Island, detain infected vessels, four of them being detained at that point, and thereby prevent the spread of disease and death and desolation all over our southern country. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. URNER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 715, after the word "cholera," insert "diphtheria."

Mr. URNER. I do not propose to take up the time of the committee, but I desire to say this in support of my amendment. I am informed that the disease of diphtheria carries off more people in the United States in a year than any other of these diseases which have been mentioned. The exact character of that disease is not positively known to the medical profession. In my own town last winter it prevailed to an alarming extent, carrying off nearly one hundred children in a very few months; five of my nearest neighbor's children dying inside of ten days. It baffled the skill of the most experienced physicians of that community and of the State. And, sir, I am informed by medical gentlemen that it is a disease that is growing in this country to an alarming extent. It seems to me that as this National Board of Health is maintained at the public expense, as there is an appropriation of the public funds for the purpose, and as these professional gentlemen of experience and skill can carry on such an inquiry without any additional expense to the Government, it would be wise and proper for them to be permitted under the law to direct their investigations to this disease that is so alarming in its character and so fatal in its results. Without detaining the committee further I ask that the amendment be adopted.

The question being taken on Mr. URNER'S amendment, there were—ayes 27, noes 45.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk commenced to read the next paragraph.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not desire to be unkind to my friend from Kentucky, but I am bound to make the point of order that we have passed over that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph, and the gentleman from Kentucky can then be recognized.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For the purchase of books and serials for use in the office of the Government actuary, $250, to be expended under direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 723 insert the following:

"United States custom-house building at Chicago, Illinois: For wood floor and flagging in basement, $9,000. For cleaning, renovating, painting walls, and repairing, $12,000. For repointing exterior stonework, resetting key-stones in window arches, rebuilding portions of court-yard walls, &c., $10,000."

Mr. ALDRICH. These repairs are recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and the estimates are made by the Supervising Architect. I have here copies of the letters from these officers and shall incorporate them in my remarks, asking the Clerk to read only the letter of the Secretary and that portion of the Supervising Architect's which I have marked.

I wish to say that because this custom-house has not been built very long the committee seem to think it is too soon to repair it. I may state we are a little unfortunate in regard to the land on which we have erected this building in Chicago. In the first year or two there is a settling, and in consequence there is an absolute necessity for some repairs. This estimate of $30,000 has been made up carefully; and in my judgment if this goes over for one year $40,000 or $50,000 will be required where $30,000 will do the work now.

The Clerk read portions of the papers submitted by Mr. ALDRICH, which in full are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 15, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a letter from the Supervising Architect of this Department, dated 10th instant, stating the necessity of certain improvements and repairs at the United States custom-house building, Chicago, Illinois, and estimating the cost thereof at $31,000.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. FRANK HISCOCK,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
March 10, 1882.

SIR: The custodian of the United States custom-house building at Chicago, Illinois, has brought to my attention the necessity for certain improvements and repairs, the execution of which would involve an expenditure too large to be made from any existing appropriation applicable thereto:

First. The laying of a wood floor in the west side of the basement now occupied by post-office clerks, and stone flagging in the east half of the basement and in north and south engine-rooms.

Second. The plastering is cracked in many places throughout the building, owing to unequal settlement, and the walls have become somewhat dingy in appearance. They require pointing up, renovating, and painting. The interior iron-work, stairs, door and window frames, columns, &c., have received but one finishing coat, all of which ought to have another.

Third. In consequence of the unequal settlement of the building many of the joints in the exterior stone-work have opened, causing the pointing to fall out, quite a number of key-stones in the window arches have dropped down out of place, and cracks have appeared in various parts of the court-yard wall, extending from the bottom to the top.

The estimated cost of making the improvements and repairs covered by the foregoing is as follows:

First, wood floor and flagging in basement	$9,000 00
Second, cleaning, renovating, and painting walls, &c	12,000 00
Third, repointing exterior stone-work, resetting key-stones in window arches, rebuilding portions of court-yard walls, &c	10,000 00
Total	31,000 00

I concur in the opinion of the custodian that this work is necessary to be done, and therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to make a special appropriation covering the estimate as above.

Very respectfully,

JAS. G. HILL,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HISCOCK. This bill carries $140,000 for repairs of public buildings generally. After a full investigation of the subject we came to the conclusion that $140,000 was all that would be needed for the current year for that purpose. So far as repairs, legitimate repairs, for the public building at Chicago are concerned, we believed sufficient provision is made for them in this appropriation; and we did not propose to admit anything which looked in the direction of change or improvement in the public building.

I will say in this connection that we have been beset from New York to initiate a plan of improvements there. And we made up our minds that we would not start to build over a public building before the paint had got dry upon it. Therefore, we rejected the appeal which came to us from New York. We rejected such appeals wherever they came from, but put in $140,000 in a gross sum, which in my judgment is sufficient.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would like to inquire if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations considers that this is included within the scope of the appropriation of $140,000?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will answer the gentleman—anything which is legitimate repairs, yes; anything which is a change of plan, no.

Mr. ALDRICH. This is mostly for repairs, and contains nothing for improvements or changes except what is really necessary.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MCCOOK here took the chair of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 723 add the following:

"For materials and labor for repairs on the United States court-house and post-office at Des Moines, Iowa, and providing additional room therein for the courts and post-office, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $45,000."

Mr. KASSON. I wish only to say that having submitted this amendment to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the committee having previously had the papers before them, I will not now occupy time in supporting it. I will merely state that this amendment has the approval of the chairman of the committee, and I ask leave to print the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the report of the custodian of the building in support of its purpose.

The Secretary, it will be observed, states that "the necessity for more room is apparent;" and in regard to the present condition of the building he uses this language:

Beside the necessity for more room I am advised that a considerable portion of the main cornice and some other of the stone work of the upper part of the building is in bad condition and should be replaced.

It has been thought advisable to combine the two objects, the making the necessary repairs and the lifting of the roof, so as to give the additional accommodation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The papers referred to by Mr. KASSON are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 27, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a communication from the custodian of the United States court-house and post-office building at Des Moines, Iowa, addressed to Hon. JOHN A. KASSON and by him referred to this Department, calling attention to the crowded condition of that building and the pressing necessity for an extension thereof.

The necessity for more room is apparent, but the extension of the building as suggested cannot be authorized until Congress shall have made an appropriation therefor. Beside the necessity for more room I am advised that a considerable portion of the main cornice and some other of the stone work of the upper part of the building is in bad condition and should be replaced.

The Supervising Architect is of the opinion that the most feasible plan for securing the additional room will be to add another story to the building; which he estimates can be done at a cost (including the expense of removing the stone work as above indicated and providing suitable elevator) of $100,000.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. FRANK HISCOCK,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

CUSTODIAN UNITED STATES COURT-HOUSE AND POST-OFFICE,
Des Moines, Iowa, February 7, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call attention to the crowded condition of the United States building in this city under my charge, and the pressing necessity for providing more room for the proper accommodation of the officers doing the public business. The building should be enlarged either by the erection of a wing or addition or by putting on another story.

I have prepared a plan of the several floors of the building, which is herewith attached. On this plan is exhibited the furniture as now placed and in use in all the rooms, and which will more plainly show the crowded condition than any description I could make. When to this is considered the number of persons employed in each room, it must be clear that the public business is hampered and hindered.

In the money-order office (room No. 1) three clerks are constantly employed. In the main office (No. 2) nine clerks and, for a portion of the day, nine letter-carriers. In the postmaster's private office (No. 3) provision is made for additional help, as required.

In the collector's office (No. 5) one clerk has to be provided with desk room, and in his main office (No. 6) one clerk, two deputies, and parts of the day three gaugers and three storekeepers. Within ninety days the completion and operation of two more distilleries in the district will compel him to find room for six or eight more employés.

In the main room of the pension agent (No. 7) there are permanently employed four clerks, and for half the time at quarterly periods as many more.

The circuit court clerk (No. 10) has two assistants, and the district court clerk (No. 16) one, but before and after terms they have from five to ten copyists.

During the sessions of the circuit and district courts the halls and many of the offices on the second floor swarm with litigants, jurymen, and witnesses, and much complaint is made by attorneys that there is no accommodation for private consultation with clients or associates. The United States district attorney has to abandon his room to public use.

The United States marshal has practically no room wherein to transact his business free from annoying and disturbing intrusion.

It is very evident that the public business here has largely outgrown the accommodations provided, and the increase in the near future bids fair to render them still more inadequate.

Yours, &c.,

L. P. SHERMAN, Custodian.

Hon. JOHN A. KASSON, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer as an amendment, to come in after the one just adopted, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to carry out the provisions of section 1753 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, $25,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will reserve all points of order on that amendment until I can hear some explanation of it.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not desire to occupy much of the time of the committee. This amendment is in pursuance of existing law, and therefore the point of order will not lie against it. It is to carry into effect that section of the Revised Statutes which authorizes the President to appoint a commission to examine applicants for office and to appoint those to office who are best qualified to fill the positions.

Unless all the declarations which have been made here are meant simply in a Pickwickian sense, this amendment should be adopted. It will give an earnest of the intention of gentlemen here to carry out in good faith the declarations they have made that they are clearly and honestly in favor of civil-service reform. This is the first opportunity they have had; the opportunity is now given them. The request for this appropriation was made by the President himself in his message to Congress. The President having asked the appropriation, and the purpose of the amendment being to enable him to carry out the object of that section of the law, which Congress enacted some years ago in response to public sentiment, it seems to me that all those who clearly desire a reform in the civil service, who desire that men fit for the position shall be appointed to office, and that the interest of the country shall weigh over political recommendations, will vote for this amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to say a word or two on the amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to incorporate in my remarks the section of the statute referred to in the amendment I have offered. It is as follows:

The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter; and for this purpose he may employ suitable persons to conduct such inquiries, and may prescribe their duties and establish regulations for the conduct of persons who may receive appointments in the civil service.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not desire to occupy the time of the committee further than to say that I most heartily approve of what has just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.] I will not take up the time of the committee now, but will ask leave to print a brief résumé of the operations of the civil-service commission appointed, as we all know, in 1874, and operating for two years with great success and advantage in the reformation of the civil service of our country.

I desire to say that in the report of that commission, which I hold in my hand, it is shown that not only the various Presidents under whom it operated approved of its proceedings but that all the heads of Departments, with I believe only a half dozen exceptions, approved also of the rules and methods of competitive examination which were introduced by that commission.

Further than that, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, the President of the United States in his first message to this Congress urged upon us this appropriation. In another message, made on the 10th of last March in response to a resolution of inquiry which I had the honor myself to introduce, he again says that this Congress should by all means appropriate the sum of $25,000 for the purpose of promoting the efficiency of the civil service in the various departments of the Government. I sincerely and most heartily hope that there will not be a vote on this floor against this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word merely to make one statement. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] has referred to one section of the statutes in his amendment. There is another section of the statutes that requires an examination of all appointees as to their fitness. That is a substantial section which is enforced and which is required to be enforced before any applicant for a position can be received on trial.
